Mr. WANGER. I am very glad the gentleman asked the question. In the third section the mails were weighed last year; their weights are ascertained in accordance with Order No. 412, of Postmaster-General Meyer. In the second section they are to be weighed this year in accordance with that order, and under this appropriation and these ascertainments of weight in these two sections of the country the payment will be in accordance with this weighing. But in the two other sections of the country, entitled under this item to relatively one-half of the $44,000,000 appropriated, the ascertainment of their daily averages is on the basis of a computation which the Attorney-General has condemned and the Postmaster-General has superseded. In other words, it will give to the two latter sections a percentage estimated by the Postmaster-General as being 9 or 10 per cent above the maximum rate of pay provided by law for the service performed.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, right there. You cover that in your amendment to the two divisions.

Mr. WANGER. That is true.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do you stop there? Is that the extent of your amendment?

Mr. WANGER. I provide that no part of the appropriation in these two divisions in excess of six-sevenths of the amount ascertained by the weighing in 1905 and 1906, when these weighings were made, shall be paid until the weights have been readjusted in accordance with Order 412, or until it shall have been finally decided by law that the railway companies in those two sections, 1 and 4, are entitled to pay according to the old ascertainment during the next fiscal year.

The gentleman from Tennessee proceeded further and referred to the facts——

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to correct him? He is referring to the speech of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. WANGER. I beg pardon, and thank my friend for the correction. That was an inadvertence. I did refer to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], who suggested that no suits had been brought or threatened and dramatically called upon the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department to investigate the Department and ascertain if there was anything wrong in it. I was very desirous of having the gentleman's legal opinion as to what was the proper action in the premises, the method of ascertaining the legal rights of the Government, and the action to be taken; but he declined, or at least failed, to throw any light upon those phases of the question. Now, at first blush, it might seem as if the administrative officers of the Government, having settled the accounts and fixed the amounts payable to each carrier for a four-year period, however erroneous the ascertainments or payments may have been, they having been voluntary by the Government, there would be no redress either by recovery of payments already made or by the withholding of payments for services rendered recently or hereafter, yet such does not seem to be the law, which is declared in the opinion, the major portion of which I shall insert, delivered in the case of Wisconsin Central Railroad Company v. United States, reported in 164 U. S., pages 205, etc., by Chief Justice Fuller, as follows:

Some reliance is placed by appellant on departmental construction, but we may dismiss that contention with the observation that we do not consider the true construction as doubtful, and that the departmental construction referred to was neither contemporaneous nor continuous. (United States v. Alabama Southern Railroad, 142 U. S., 615; United States v. Healey, 160 U. S., 136.)

We agree entirely with the Court of Claims that the terms and conditions imposed on this grant embraced the condition that the mail should be carried at such rates as Congress might fix, and that section 13 of the act of July 12, 1876 (c. 179, 19 Stat., 78), was applicable. The item of $16,343.48 was properly disallowed, as was also the item of $12,532.43, unless the latter was recoverable by reason of some ground of objection to its extinguishment by the application of the sums unlawfully paid to and received by the company.

And as to that it is insisted that such application can not be made because it was not competent for the Postmaster-General to withhold the moneys thus paid without authority of law, as the previous directions to make the payments were decisions binding on the Department; because the payments were voluntarily made on due consideration and deliberation and the accounts settled, and because no counterclaim was filed.

The Postmaster-General in directing payment of compensation for mail transportation, under the statutes providing the rate and basis thereof, does not act judicially, and whatever the conclusiveness of executive acts so far as executive departments are concerned, as a rule of administration, it has long been settled that the action of executive officers in matters of account and payment can not be regarded as a conclusive determination when brought in question in a court of justice. United States v. Harmon, 43 Fed. Rep., 560, by Mr. Justice Gray; S. C., 147, U. S. 268; Hunter v. United States, 5 Pet., 173; United States v. Jones, 8 Pet., 387; United States v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet., 377.)

In the latter case, which was a suit upon negotiable drafts accepted by the Postmaster-General (the authority to do so being assumed for the purpose of the case), and which was decided after the passage of the act of July 2, 1836 (c. 270, 5 Stat., 80, 83), whose seventeenth section was carried forward as section 4057 of the Revised Statutes, Mr. Justice Wayne, delivering the opinion of the court, discussed the power of a succeeding Postmaster-General to revise the action of his predecessor as to credits, as follows:

"The third instruction asked the court to say, among other things, if the credits given by Mr. Barry were for extra allowances, which the said Postmaster-General was not legally authorized to allow, then it was the duty of the present Postmaster-General to disallow such terms of credit. The successor of Mr. Barry had the same power, and no more, than his predecessor, and the power of the former did not extend to the recall of credits or allowances made by Mr. Barry, if he acted within the scope of official authority given by law to the head of the Department. This right in an incumbent of reviewing a predecessor's decisions extends to mistakes in matters of fact arising from errors in calculation and to cases of rejected claims in which material testimony is afterwards discovered and produced. But if a credit has been given, or an allowance made, as these were, by the head of a Department, and it is alleged to be an illegal allowance, the judicial tribunals of the country must be resorted to to construe the law under which the allowance was made and to settle the rights between the United States and the party to whom the credit was given.

"It is no longer a case between the correctness of one officer's judgment and that of his successor. A third party is interested, and he can not be deprived of a payment on a credit so given, but by the intervention of a court to pass upon his right. No statute is necessary to authorize the United States to sue in such a case. The right to sue is independent of statute, and it may be done by the direction of the incumbent of the Department. The act of July 2, 1836, entitled 'An act to change the organization of the Post-Office Department,' is only affirmative of the antecedent right of the Government to sue, and directory to the Postmaster-General to cause suits to be brought in the cases mentioned in the seventeenth section of that act. It also excludes him from determining, finally, any case which he may suppose to arise under that section. His duty is to cause a suit to be brought. Additional allowances the Postmaster-General could make under the forty-third section of the act of March 2, 1825 (3 Story, 1985); and we presume it was because allowances were supposed to have been made contrary to that law that the seventeenth section of the act of July 2, 1836, was passed. In this last the extent of the Postmaster-General's power, in respect to allowances, is too plain to be mistaken.

"We can not say that either of the sections of the acts of 1825 and 1836 just alluded to covers the allowances made by Mr. Barry to Reeside. But if the Postmaster-General thought they did and that such a defense could have availed against the rights of the bank to claim these acceptances as credits in this suit, the same proof which would have justified a recovery in an action by the United States would have justified the rejection of them as credits when they are claimed as a set-off."

The view thus indicated, that executive decisions in cases like the present are not binding on the courts, has been repeatedly affirmed and steadily adhered to. (Gordon v. United States, 1 C. Cls., 1; McElrath v. United States, 12 C. Cls., 201; Duval v. United States, 25 C. Cls., 46; Steele v. United States, 113 U. S., 128; United States v. Burchard, 125 U. S., 176; United States v. Stahl, 151 U. S., 366.) And it has been often applied in the instance of the improvident issue of patents. (United States v. Stone, 2 Wall., 525; United States v. Minor, 114 U. S., 233; Mullan v. United States, 118 U. S., 271; Wisconsin Railroad Co. v. Forsythe, 159 U. S., 46.)

In Steele v. United States, the Navy Department, in contracting with the claimant for certain work upon vessels, delivered to him certain old materials at the agreed price of $2,000, which was considerably less than the true value. In his suit for payment on the contract it was contended that the delivery of these materials to him at an agreed price was without warrant of law, and that the materials having been disposed of should be accounted for by the claimant at their true value. This contention was sustained, and this court said:

"The fact that the account of the appellant was settled by the officers of the Navy Department, by charging him with the value of the old material at $2,000, is no bar to the recovery of its real value by the Government. The whole transaction was illegal, and appellant is chargeable with knowledge of the fact."

In United States v. Burchard, the claimant, an engineer officer, retired October 26, 1874, and entitled to half sea pay, was paid from said date up to April 1, 1878, at a higher rate, whereby he received $425 in excess of that allowed by law, his pay at that rate being passed from time to time by both the disbursing officers in the Navy Department and by the accounting officers. After April 1, 1878, he was paid at a lower rate, which this court held to be the legal rate. He brought suit for the difference after 1878, and the Government counterclaimed for the $425 paid to him prior to that time. His petition was dismissed, and the court held the Government could recover the overpayment for the prior period. Mr. Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court, observed that in no event was he entitled to more than half sea pay, and that all over that which he got was by mistake of the accounting officers, and said:

"It only remains to consider whether the amount which has thus been paid, or as much thereof as is embraced in the counterclaim, can be recovered back in this action, and we are of the opinion that it can. The action was brought by Burchard to recover a balance claimed to be due on pay account from the date of his retirement. He had been paid according to his present claim until April 1, 1878, and consequently there was nothing to complain of back of that date. But in reality the account had never been closed, and was always open to adjustment. Overpayments made at one time by mistake could be corrected and properly charged against credits coming in afterwards. His pay was fixed by law, and the disbursing officers of the Department had no authority to allow him any more. If they did, it was in violation of the law, and he has no right to keep what he thus obtained. Whether the Government can in any case be precluded from reclaiming money which has been paid by its disbursing and accounting officers under a mistake of law is a question which it is not now necessary to decide any more than it was in McElrath v. United States (102 U. S., 426, 441), when it was suggested. This is a case where the disbursing officer, supposing that a retired officer of the Navy was entitled to more than it turns out the law allowed, have overpaid him. Certainly under such circumstances the mistake may be corrected."

In United States v. Stahl, the claimant, a naval officer, upon a difference of opinion as to the law, had been overpaid in the grade then occupied by him, and sued for a deficiency claimed to exist in his previous grade. This court sustained his contention as to the previous grade and held that he had been entitled in that grade to the increased compensation, but that the excessive payments which had been made to him in the latter grade should be deducted from any sum which might be found due him in the former.

In Mullan v. United States, a suit to vacate a patent which had been granted for certain coal lands, the court held that the mistake was one of law, but that nevertheless, it having been committed and the patent given for lands which the land officers were not authorized the patent, the patent could be annulled by the court. And Mr. Chief Justice Waite said:

"It is no doubt true that the actual character of the lands was as well known at the Department of the Interior as it was anywhere else, and that the Secretary approved the lists not because he was mistaken about the facts, but because he was of opinion that coal lands were not mineral lands within the meaning of the act of 1853, and that they were open to selection by the State; but this does not alter the case. The list was certified without authority of law, and, therefore, by a mistake against which relief in equity may be afforded. As was said in United States v. Stone (2 Wall., 525, 535): 'The patent is but evidence of a grant, and the officer who issues it acts ministerially and not judicially. If he issues a patent for land reserved from sale by law, such patent is void for want of authority. But one officer of the Land Office is not competent to cancel or annul the act of his predecessor. That is a judicial act and requires the judgment of a court.'"

In Wisconsin Central Railroad Company v. Forsythe, which was an action of ejectment to recover certain lands claimed to have been included within its grant, but which defendant insisted were outside of its grant and subject to private entry, this court said:

"But further, it is urged that this question of title has been determined in the Land Department adversely to the claim of the plaintiff. This is doubtless true, but it was so determined, not upon any question of fact, but upon the construction of the law; and such matter, as we have repeatedly held, is not concluded by the decision of the Land Department."

As a general rule, and on grounds of public policy, the Government can not be bound by the action of its officers, who must be held to the performance of their duties within the strict limits of their legal authority, where by misconstruction of the law under which they have assumed to act, unauthorized payments are made. Whiteside v. United States (93 U. S., 247); Hawkins v. United States (96 U. S., 689), and cases before cited. The question is not presented as between the Government and its officer, or between the officer and the recipient of such payments, but as between the Government and the recipient, and is then a question whether the latter can be allowed to retain the fruits of actions not authorized by law, resulting from an erroneous conclusion by the agent of the Government as to the legal effect of the particular statutory law under or in reference to which he is proceeding.

Section 4057 of the Revised Statutes reads:

"In all cases where money has been paid out of the funds of the Post-Office Department under the pretense that service had been performed therefor, when, in fact, such service has not been performed, or as an additional allowance for increased service actually rendered, when the additional allowance exceeds the sum which, according to law, might rightfully have been allowed therefor, and in all other cases where money of the Department has been paid to any person in consequence of fraudulent representations, or by the mistake, collusion, or misconduct of any officer or other employee in the postal service, the Postmaster-General shall cause suit to be brought to recover such wrong or fraudulent payment or excess, with interest thereon."

Undoubtedly the word "mistake," as used in this section, includes an erroneous conclusion in the construction or application of a statute. And, this being so, as the duty is devolved on the Postmaster-General to cause suit to be brought where money has been illegally paid by reason of misconstruction or misapprehension of the applicable law, it follows that he must be regarded as empowered to reconsider prior decisions to determine whether such a mistake has been committed or not. If, in his judgment, money has been paid without authority of law, and he has money of the same claimant in his hands, he is not compelled to pay such money over and sue to recover the illegal payments, but may hold it subject to the decision of the court when the claimant sues. (United States v. Carr, 132 U. S., 644; Gratiot v. United States, 15 Pet., 336; Steele v. United States, United States v. Burchard, United States v. Stahl, supra.) And in that way multiplicity of suits and circuity of action are avoided.

It is unnecessary to go into a discussion of the exceptions which may exist between private parties to the rule that moneys paid through mistake of law can not be recovered back.

This branch of the case was disposed of by the Court of Claims on the authority of Duval v. United States (25 C. Cl., 46). It was there held that "the items of the several statements upon which the Sixth Auditor certifies balances due for carrying the mails ordinarily, and in the absence of special circumstances may be regarded as running accounts, at least while the parties continue the same dealings between themselves; and that money paid in violation of law upon balances certified by the accounting officers generally may be recovered back by counterclaim or otherwise where no peculiar circumstances appear to make such recovery inequitable and unjust." The mistake was, indeed, treated as one of fact, the Post-Office officials erroneously assuming, through oversight, that the road in question had not been aided by grants of land, but the governing principle in the case before us is the same.

Reference was made to Barnes v. District of Columbia (22 C. Cl., 366, 394), wherein it was ruled, Richardson, C. J., delivering the opinion, that "The doctrine that money paid can be recovered back when paid in mistake of fact and not of law does not have so general application to public officers using the funds of the people as to individuals dealing with their own money where nobody but themselves suffer for their ignorance, carelessness, or indiscretion, because in the former case the elements of agency and the authority and duty of officers, and their obligations to the public, of which all persons dealing with them are bound to take notice, are always involved." We concur in these views, and are of opinion that there is nothing on this record to take the case out of the scope of the principle that parties receiving moneys illegally paid by a public officer are liable ex æquo et bono to refund them.

The petition sets forth, among other things, that the Postmaster-General wrongfully and unlawfully withheld the $12,532.43 out of moneys due petitioner, which was, therefore, entitled to recover the full amount; and to each and every allegation of the petition the Government interposed a general traverse. It is now said that a counterclaim or set-off should have been pleaded, but the record does not disclose that this objection was raised below, while the findings of fact show that the entire matter was before the court for, and received, adjudication. Moreover, it has been repeatedly held that the forms of pleading in the Court of Claims are not of so strict a character as to require omissions of this kind to be held fatal to the rendition of such judgment as the facts demand. (United States v. Burns, 12 Wall., 246, 254; Clark v. United States, 95 U. S., 539, 543; United States v. Behan, 110 U. S., 338, 347; United States v. Carr, 132 U. S., 644, 650.)

Judgment affirmed.

Mr. Justice Peckham dissented on the question of the right of the Government to offset the alleged overpayments prior to July 1, 1883.

Mr. WANGER. Surely the Postmaster-General was conscious of the payment of money in excess of legal compensation for carrying the mails on all routes to which the maximum rate of pay was allowed, and perhaps in some others, by mistake, when he established Order No. 412, and might have felt it his duty, after the accuracy and validity of that order was sustained by the Attorney-General, to bring suits to recover excessive payments, unless he was misled by the unfortunate sentence of the Attorney-General, and certainly if he has not been be will become conscious of many mistaken payments when he looks into the matter, as he undoubtedly will, and the question of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] was therefore very pertinent, "Why has no suit been brought?"

There is a partial answer in the suggestion that perhaps there is another remedy. In the case cited the court says (p. 211):

> If in his (the Postmaster-General's) judgment money has been paid without authority of law and he has money of the same claimant in his hands, he is not compelled to pay such money over and sue to recover the illegal payments, but may hold it subject to the decision of the court when the claimant sues. (United States v. Carr, 132 U. S., 644; Gratiot v. United States, 15 Pet., 336.)

And in that way multiplicity of suits and circuity of action are avoided.

And there is another principle involved in the question of right of action against the railway mail carriers, or of withholding payment from them because of overpayments by mistake in the past, that is illustrated in the case of the United States v. Alabama Great Southern Railway Company (142 U. S., 615, etc.) in the following opinion of the court by Mr. Justice Brown:

OPINION OF THE COURT.

This case depends upon the construction to be given to section 13 of the act of July 12, 1876, which reads as follows: "SEC. 13. That railroad companies whose railroad was constructed in whole or in part by a land grant made by Congress on the condition that the mails should be transported over their road at such price as Congress should by law direct shall receive only 80 per cent of the compensation authorized by this act." As it is admitted that the construction of so much of this road as lay within the States of Alabama and Mississippi, amounting to 263.85 miles, was aided by the proceeds of lands granted by the acts of Congress of June 3, 1856 (11 Stat., 17, c. 41), and August 11, 1856 (11 Stat., 30, c. 83), and the residue of such road lying within the States of Tennessee and Georgia, amounting to 31.6 miles, was constructed without such aid, the question is presented whether the Government is entitled to the transportation of the mail over the whole of such road at 80 per cent of the compensation provided for roads which have received no aid from Congress, or whether such percentage applies only to so much of the road as lies within the States of Alabama and Mississippi.

The difficulty arises from the fact that, by section 13, above quoted, all roads "constructed in whole or in part" by Congressional land grants are bound to carry at the reduced rates. These words, however, are susceptible of several constructions. They may mean such roads as received grants of land the proceeds of whose sales were sufficient to pay the entire or only the partial cost of their construction. In this case the language would be confined to the linear parts of such roads as receive the aid of the land grants—in the case under consideration only that part of the road lying in Alabama or Mississippi. Or they may mean that railroads any linear part of which received the aid of a land grant of Congress in its construction should be bound to carry the mails at a reduced rate over the entire line. This, which is doubtless the literal reading of the statute, supports the contention of the Government in this case. As applied to the particular facts of the present case, this interpretation of the statute would work no great hardship, since the unaided part of the road was but little more than 10 per cent of the entire line; but if the case were reversed and the unaided part amounted only to 10 per cent of the entire road, it would be equally within the words of the statute and the injustice of the construction would become clearly apparent, especially in the case put in the opinion of the learned judge of the court below, if there were a parallel rival road, unaided by a Congressional grant, receiving the full compensation allowed by law. It would also result from this that if there were two separate roads forming a continuous line, one of which was aided and the other unaided by a land grant, each receiving its appropriate compensation, and these roads were subsequently consolidated, the aided portion would draw after it its own compensation at the reduced rate and would compel it to be applied to the whole line.

But these words are still susceptible of a third construction, viz, that any railroad, the entire line of which or only certain linear portions of which had been constructed by a Congressional land grant, should receive the reduced rate properly proportioned to the part which had received such aid; and that, as to the unaided portion, it should receive the full compensation allowed by law. This was the construction given to it by the Postmaster-General and by the accounting officers of the Treasury at the time the act was passed, and the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company and its successor, the appellee, was, and continued to be, paid upon that basis from 1876 to 1885, by six Postmasters-General, when, in 1885, the then incumbent of the office reversed the rulings of his predecessors, and not only subjected the entire line to the reduced rates, but made such construction retroactive and enforced payment of what the road had for nine years received under the prior construction.

We think the contemporaneous construction thus given by the executive department of the Government, and continued for nine years through six different administrations of that department—a construction which, though inconsistent with the literalism of the act, certainly consorts with the equities of the case—should be considered as decisive in this suit. It is a settled doctrine of this court that, in case of ambiguity, the judicial department will lean in favor of a construction given to a statute by the department charged with the execution of such statute, and, if such construction be acted upon for a number of years, will look with disfavor upon any sudden change whereby parties who have contracted with the Government upon the faith of such construction may be prejudiced. It is especially objectionable that a construction of a statute favorable to the individual citizen should be changed in such manner as to become retroactive, and to require from him the repayment of moneys to which he had supposed himself entitled and upon the expectation of which he had made his contracts with the Government. These principles were announced as early as 1827 in Edwards' Lessee v. Darby (12 Wheat., 206, 210), and have been steadily adhered to in subsequent decisions. (United States v. State Bank of North Carolina, 6 Pet., 29, 39; United States v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet., 1; Brown v. United States, 113 U. S., 568; United States v. Moore, 95 U. S., 760, 763.)

The construction we have given to this act is also in harmony with that given to the Pacific Railroad act of 1862 in United States v. Kansas Pacific Railway Company (99 U. S., 455), and the Thurman Act of May 7, 1878, in the United States v. Central Pacific Railroad Company (118 U. S., 235).

There was no error in the judgment of the Court of Claims, and it is therefore affirmed.

So that while the Supreme Court in this case sustained the modern interpretation of the statute as literal, it declared the retroactive provision as harsh and justified standing by the earlier administrative instruction, just as I am inclined to think it would do if the Postmaster-General was to bring suit to recover any payments made prior to the adoption of this Order 412. But as to what the railway companies may be earning since that time a different principle is involved, as every contract was subject to future orders, and as to what they will earn in the next fiscal year an entirely different principle is involved from what would be involved in a suit to recover for past payments which they undoubtedly believe themselves entitled to receive. So that the provisions of my amendment, containing nothing radical or revolutionary or at war with any principle of law or of justice, as it seems to me, can be safely adopted.

In further reply to the inquiry of why the Postmaster-General has done nothing more than apply Order 412 to the weighings subsequent to its adoption, I beg to ask how can Congress be absolved from responsibility, if there is any point in that inquiry, if we fail now to take action limiting payments to be made in the next fiscal year for which we are now appropriating money to what we believe is all that is legally due for the service? Are we in this appropriation to say it may be inequitable, it may be illogical, that in one-half of the country the maximum rate shall mean 100 per cent of the amount of compensation specified by law, but nevertheless in the other half of the country we will pay 109 or 116 per cent of the same maximum rate because a mistake has been made heretofore? We may excuse the past on account of the hiatus possible and unwisdom of raking up the errors of the past, but how can we justify ourselves if we believe in the accuracy of Order 412, but continue to provide for payment for the future upon a basis we condemn as illegal and perpetuate this unequal method of excessive compensation? Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WANGER. While fully persuaded of the soundness of reasoning of the Attorney-General, I yet realize that there is another side, which was most ably presented by that efficient and conscientious public servant, Second Assistant Postmaster-

General Shallenberger, in his letter to the Postmaster-General printed in the hearings in January, 1907, by the Committee on the Post-Office. Let the committee determine whether he and his predecessors were misled by sophisms or were correct, as this amendment will enable the court of last resort to determine. And to that decision we shall all bow, glad in any result that the controversy has been ended and the law vindicated.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, in the matter of the divisor, the executive order No. 412 does not, in my opinion, bar the past, The word "hereafter" is absent from the order, and the only element of futurity in it is in the word "shall."

Last year we applied by legislation two flat reductions in railway-mail pay on average weights above 5,000 pounds. The Department had no embarrassment whatever in applying those flat reductions to all the four sections of the country, but when the Department came to apply the corrected divisor, it applied it only to the section being weighed, as this bill applies it to the section now being weighed and the section weighed last year, and omitted the two other sections. The gentleman from Pennsylvania now, by an amendment, seeks, as I understand it, to make the Department correct the divisor to the two other sections which were weighed two and three years ago.

Mr. WANGER. Put them all on a parity.

Mr. MURDOCK. Put all four sections on a parity. Frankly I do not see how we in Congress can do it in light of how Congress refused to act last year. I do not believe, from what I have read from the Attorney-General, from the Department, and from what I have listened to on the floor of this House, that Congress has anything to do with the divisor or can reach the divisor in any way.

Last year I offered an amendment similar in form to this one proposed to-day, believing myself wholly within order. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole at that time ruled it out of order. I found myself estopped from any remedial proceeding. I appealed from the decision of the Chair. I had 17 votes with me and about 60 against me. That ruling seemed to appeal to the membership of this House as being perfectly sound. And if I am to accept the opinions of the legal giants of this country, I must think it was because the Attorney-General in saying that the divisor was wrong and should be corrected took particular pains to approve the decision here in the House, that the limitation I sought to put upon an appropriation was out of order.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I concede that while we can not change existing law in this bill under the rules of the House, where they are enforced, yet there is nothing to compel us to appropriate all the money that may be required by law. Therefore we may appropriate less than the full amount authorized by law.

Mr. MURDOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WANGER. Why, when a demonstration has been made that railroad companies are getting 9 to 10 per cent in excess of the maximum compensation fixed by law, is there any use in having sophistry about the subject? Does not that show that the ascertainment is illegal? Does the gentleman think it is in the province of any Executive Department of this Government by order, by method of divisor, or any other feature in calculation to provide a rate of compensation above that fixed by law?

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all, and I want to ask the gentleman in return if he says I have been indulging in any sophistry in the question of the divisor.

Mr. WANGER. Not at all; but the gentleman has referred to labored statements to which I referred, about its being in the discretion of the Postmaster-General to apply one method or another in ascertaining the average weight of mails carried per day.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is exactly what I am coming to now.

Mr. WANGER. My contention is that no matter what form or manner of computation is used it must be, as the Attorney-General states, directed to the ascertainment of true average weight for every day in the year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, the Attorney-General rules that the old divisor was wrong. He does not rule that the old divisor was wrong on the plain proposition and the sensible proposition that you can not take seven days' aggregate, put them into a dividend, take six for a divisor, and get a fair average by dividing the seven by six for a quotient. No, he does not; but he goes further and into a new field, and says that the Department violated the old law in that it weighed mails on Sunday at all.

Mr. WANGER. Oh, no.

Mr. MURDOCK. He does.

Mr. WANGER. He does not decide anything of that kind.

Mr. MURDOCK. He does, and makes that a particular point in the decision, if the gentleman will read it.

Mr. WANGER. He decided that the Department did wrong in putting the Sunday weights into the Monday weighing and then using six as a divisor.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think if the gentleman will read that decision he will find that it was contended there was no provision in law for weighing the mails on Sunday at all.

Mr. WANGER. Oh, no; my friend has entirely misconceived the scope of the Attorney-General's opinion.

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all. The Attorney-General has ruled that it is a matter of discretion with the Postmaster-General—that the Postmaster-General could, under the old system, use a short divisor; that he can under a more recent order use a corrected and a full divisor. He has also held in his opinion that it was perfectly correct for the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House of Congress to overrule any attempt to limit that appropriation in similar form, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] now seeks to do. It seems to be wholly in the hands of the Department. The Department can apply this new divisor to this one section this year and the other section and cease there. It can by a simple matter of computation apply that corrected divisor to all other sections to-day, and make it immediate, as I think it should. It can, if it wishes, go on back, I suppose, and collect the incredible amount of money which has been in the nature of an overcharge for thirty-five years; it seems wholly in the hands of the Department. It does not rest with Congress. Some of you gentlemen remember that I made every parliamentary attempt that is possible under the rules to get some action from Congress on this subject last year. I did not indulge in demagogy. I did not go to an excess in speech or indulge in an accusation against anybody. I had to get up and continually resent the charge that I was accusing some one of looting the Treasury.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman permit another interruption?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; not right here. Let me go on.

Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] proposes to come in and apply a limitation to this appropriation. I doubt, to some extent, his wisdom. I want to tell him why, and I hope I will have time in which to do it.

Mr. WANGER. Does the gentleman mean my personal wisdom generally or as involved in the proposition?

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman's wisdom as a Representative from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WANGER. That is pretty comprehensive.

Mr. MURDOCK. Under the present order of the Postmaster-General, the power rests wholly in the Department to apply this divisor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for ten minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WANGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, before my friend impeaches my wisdom, instead of confining himself to the proposition——

Mr. MURDOCK. I wish I had had the gentleman with me last year.

Mr. WANGER. I will say that I was against the proposition of the gentleman last year. So long as you proposed to pay the companies that only carried mail six days 116 per cent of the compensation that they would get if they carried the mail on the seventh day, the proposition was so inequitable that I could not help but reject it; and, unfortunately, my perceptive faculties were not sufficiently keen to then realize the force of the gentleman's logic, and how a rule might be applied with just effect, and that the error of his position was in failing to apply such rule to secure an average weight per day instead of per "working day," and further to see that the vice contained in it was not as it applied to the roads that were carrying mails on seven days in the week, but was in it as applied to the roads that only carried mail six days in a week. The Postmaster-General says that 365,000 pounds in a year gives an average of 1,000 pounds a day. As that is unanswerable, so, I submit, that a form of divisor which by a month of weighing makes that total an average of 1,166 pounds per day——

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes. And the old divisor is wrong and was wrong; and how can this House, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the face of a former ruling of its chairman under the rules, taking into consideration the ruling of the Attorney-General, ask a change in the divisor? How can this House legislate on it without——

Mr. WANGER. By paying what is conceded to be the maximum of lawful pay and withholding what exceeds that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, what I wanted to say, and one of the purposes for which I arose, was this: Under the opinion of the Attorney-General, and under the practice of the Department now, there has been no change of law. The Department now is making, and will make in the next four years, a reduction of $4,000,000 in the annual pay to the railroads without any change of law. Under the opinion of the Attorney-General the Department makes that change of and in itself, without any grant of power from this body or any other body. If the Department has the right to make that change now, without any change of law, then the Department for thirty years, as I have contended in every address I have made to the House on the subject, disregarded the law. It paid the railroads a sum that it would probably be impossible to recover to-day because of its immensity. But what has happened? The railroads are combating the order. One of them has started in the Court of Claims a suit to defeat Order 412. The government of this country, as represented by the Department, whether it acts in its legislative or executive capacity—the Department retains over the railroads of this country the opportunity for recovery so long as there is no change of law. And when this Congress, or any other Congress, enacts into law the corrected divisor, it may close the door on possible recovery from the railroads. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman upon the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I call the Chair's attention to the language in the amendment, which is in no wise a limitation, but a direction to withhold the payment of a certain proportion of pay which has been ascertained. Now, the law under which the pay for railway mail transportation is made, as the Chair understands, is the act of March 3, 1873, with certain amendments thereafter. Under the law fixing the pay and the manner of its ascertainment the appropriations are made from year to year. The amendment before the committee directs that only six-sevenths of the amount ascertained pursuant to the law shall be paid until certain things have been done. If the law has been followed, if the weighings have been taken according to the law, then the appropriation should be made to meet the payments; and if not made, the carrying roads would have a right of action in the Court of Claims. It is not an amendment equivalent to an amendment to reduce the amount. An amendment to reduce the amount by so many hundred thousand dollars would undoubtedly be in order. The amendment directs the withholding of the payment. An amendment striking out all would be in order. An amendment directing the withholding the payment of the amount would not be in order, because not on all fours with the other suggested amendment. Now, another difference of this amendment, Mr. Chairman, is quite apparent. This is to bring within the scope of the so-called "Order 412" the payments on weighings which were had preceding the issuing of Order 412.

That is to say, that the roads in the New England division and in the Pacific Coast States division shall not be paid the full amount due them in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1909 until it has been demonstrated that they were underpaid or overpaid for the years 1905 and 1906. I wish to repeat and emphasize what I have just said. This appropriation, a portion of which the amendment proposes to withhold, is for the allowance for the fiscal year 1909. The proposed amendment seeks to withhold a part of that appropriation until certain computations have been made in years preceding the issuing of Order 412.

Now, the Attorney-General, in a recent decision, commented upon a point of order of similar character made in this House when this item of appropriation was under consideration for the current fiscal year. In volume 41 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 3471, will be found the comment relating to the point of order which was then made, which sought to fix a method of computation in a similar way to that which is now being fixed by Order 412. The proposed amendment to which the point of order was then addressed was made before Order 412 had been promulgated, and the gentleman then occupying the chair sustained the point of order for reasons that are in the RECORD at page 3471—volume 41, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The Attorney-General afterwards, expressing an opinion on Order 412, used this expression:

> It has been held that where the meaning of a statute is doubtful or ambiguous, the practical construction placed upon it by the Department of the Government charged with its administration, if contemporaneous, uniform, and long-continued, although not deemed controlling on the courts, is to be treated with respect and will ordinarily be followed.

But in a later part of his decision, commenting again upon the action of the Chair in sustaining the point of order, the Attorney-General in his opinion uses this language:

> As to the decision of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, sustained upon appeal, to the effect that the proposed amendment requiring a divisor of not less than the whole number of days such mails have been weighed made a change in existing law, I am not aware of any precedent holding such decision to be binding upon the Department. This decision may be held to have been correct without regard to the construction alluded to by the Chairman to have been placed upon the law by the proper officer.

Now, since Order 412 was promulgated by the Postmaster-General, and the opinion on it by the Attorney-General, the Department has instituted a certain practice relative to ascertaining the rate of pay, and under that practice has not gone back to the year 1905 and 1906; and applying the proposition of the Attorney-General, therefore, to the practice of the Department having the control of the administration of law, the Chair should at least give respect, as the Attorney-General says, if it may not be controlled by it. I think that this amendment is obnoxious both to the former decision upon a similar point of order where the point was sustained and to the opinion of the Attorney-General; and for the third reason, that it is not a limitation, but is a direction to withhold part of what, under the practice, has been properly ascertained.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ascertain from the gentleman if the present occupant of the chair supposes correctly that this amendment relates to the payment of the appropriation under this bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is my understanding.

The CHAIRMAN. And the balance due for the years 1905 and 1906?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Balance due?

The CHAIRMAN. Whether there are balances due or not.

Mr. WANGER. Not at all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not understand that. There are no balances; they have been paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. The appropriations for prior years would be available for the payment of any balances, if they were due.

Mr. WANGER. If the gentleman will pardon me, the payments out of this appropriation bill for the year 1909 in those two districts will be made, unless there is some action taken by Congress or by the executive department, pursuant to the weighing of 1905 in the one district and of 1906 in the other district; not for the services in those years, but for the services during the fiscal year 1909; and the appropriation is for that service.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask just what is the order of Postmaster-General Meyer, No. 412? No one has explained that to the committee.

Mr. WANGER. Order No. 412, dated June 7, 1907, reads:

> When the weight of mail is taken on railroad routes the whole number of days included in the weighing period shall be used as the divisor for obtaining the average weight per day.

Mr. STAFFORD. I may say, if the Chair will permit me to offer some elucidation of this subject, Order 412 has only been applied to that weighing district in which the mail was weighed last spring, and will be applied in the successive three districts of the country as the mails are weighed; and the purpose of this amendment is to extend it to two of those districts, which will be weighed in the year following this one and the year following that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then this amendment would not affect the ascertainment of the amount due for the carrying of the mail at all?

Mr. WANGER. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Except as modified by the order of the Postmaster-General?

Mr. WANGER. The effect of this amendment would simply be on the payment out of appropriations.

Mr. MURDOCK. For this year?

Mr. WANGER. For the next fiscal year.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the Chair will permit me to submit the proposition, on the basis that the law fixes the method of ascertaining the weight of mail, and fixes the weight of pay, the presumption is that Congress may make annual appropriations to meet those payments. Now, that is existing law. Supposing we offer an amendment with reference to that item of appropriation, providing that only 25 per cent of the amount found due shall be paid. Would not that be contrary to existing law, because existing law directs that the payments shall be in accordance with the total weight and the total mileage——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is within the power of Congress to appropriate all or any portion of what may be due, and the Chair would like to have the attention of the committee.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, in order that we may understand just what that amendment does, my understanding is that under the orders of the Post-Office Department, as existing, whatever they were, the gentleman claims that, as measured by and under Order 412, the roads were overpaid in the years 1906 and 1907; and this is a proposition to withhold the money from them for services done under the new order, in 1909, until there is a readjustment under the new order; and if, measured by the new order, they were overpaid under the old order in 1906-7, then that amount shall be withheld in 1909. It operates positively to change the law, and would make Order 412 become retroactive.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ascertain on that point. That is not the understanding of the Chair as to the amendment.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. That is the exact effect of it, and it has no other purpose here.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. May we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Jersey has stated what is most decidedly not the question involved in this amendment. Order No. 412 did not affect, could not affect, and did not pretend to affect the law as to compensation of the railway companies. There is nothing in this proposition to alter or change the law as affecting the compensation for the past or the present fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. May the Chair ask whether the gentleman contends that his amendment simply extends the operation of Order No. 412 throughout the United States instead of confining it to a particular locality?

Mr. WANGER. That would be the practical effect—to make its operation uniform throughout the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WANGER. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman contend that his amendment is identical in effect with Order 412 as administered by the Department, following the decision of the Attorney-General? According to the decision of the Attorney-General, on those roads where they have but three days' service, where prior thereto the railroads received compensation based upon the divisor of ninety out of one hundred and five days' weighing, to-day, under that order, they would receive but three-sevenths of the divisor of one hundred and five, because the service was rendered only three days in the week.

Mr. WANGER. Not because the service was rendered only three days in the week.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's amendment provides for withholding compensation to the amount of six-sevenths, so you can not contend that your amendment is on all fours with Order No. 412.

Mr. WANGER. Order 412 provides for the payment of no more than the compensation fixed by law, and in its application this fiscal year extends to only one weighing section of the country. The next fiscal year will apply to two weighing sections of the country, and in the other sections—unless something is done by somebody, the manner of making payments goes on as it has heretofore—will be paid on the basis of 116.16 per cent of the compensation allowed by law.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Department can do that.

Mr. WANGER. Certainly the Department can do it; but if Congress distinctly refuses to act when it is confronted with the question squarely presented, why should the Department take any action?

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the amendment—possibly there is some confusion; we do not always catch things correctly—I want to discard from the consideration of the question the two divisions, one weighed last year and one which has been or will be weighed this year. We have two other divisions weighed in 1905 and 1906. The Department has adopted a method of estimating the amount of mail carried, by which they, in effect, weigh the mail for seven days, add the result, and divide the sum by six, thereby giving an average larger than it ought to be. Everybody seems to agree that that was a wrong divisor in the beginning—1905.

Mr. WANGER. Oh, no; I do not think the railway companies concede that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. I believe the gentleman is right that far, but all the House seems to agree that the divisor ought to be seven. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that though they did not use the right divisor in the beginning they ought to do it in the future.

Mr. WANGER. That is it.

Mr. HARDY. And one reason urged against his amendment is that they have not done justice heretofore, and therefore they ought not to do justice now. The gentleman's amendment does not affect the two sections that are by the order of the Postmaster-General now divided by seven.

Mr. WANGER. Not at all.

Mr. HARDY. But we wish to make the Postmaster-General divide the other two sections also by seven. Now, the question is, as it seems to me, if Congress has passed a law and the Department has by a wrong divisor been paying an amount larger than it ought to pay, has an appropriation measure the right to restrict that payment and provide what they ought to pay? In other words, the gentleman's amendment proposes to restrict the amount paid to what ought to have been paid from the beginning of the weighing.

Mr. WANGER. No; not from the beginning of the weighing, but what ought to be paid during the coming fiscal year, according to the quantity of mail carried during the year.

Mr. HARDY. I was inaccurate; I mean just what the gentleman says. Not to go back and try to correct what was done in 1905 and 1906, but in the future, instead of criticising the Department, let the House go on record in favor of a just divisor.

Mr. WANGER. That is it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few observations solely upon the point of order, not upon the merits of the proposition. The proposition, it strikes me, is one that has a good deal of merit, but we are considering now purely a parliamentary question, and that is whether the amendment is in order under the rules of the House as a limitation upon an appropriation. It is hardly in the form of a limitation. It contains provisions directing the Postmaster-General to make a new ascertainment of weights.

Mr. WANGER. Oh, not at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then I have not the amendment in mind.

Mr. WANGER. Here it is.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There may be amendments in the form of limitations, yet in substance embody legislation; in substance they may direct things to be done, and the Chair in looking at a question of order must determine the real effect of the amendment and not simply its form. The substance and not the form should control. Now, I gather from this discussion that under the law it was discretionary with the Postmaster-General prior to the making of Order 412 to adopt six or seven as the divisor, and when the mails were weighed in 1905 and 1906 in the two sections in controversy, those weighings were understood to control for a period of four years, and the Postmaster-General adopted six as the divisor in the process of ascertainment, probably an unjust thing; but I understand from this discussion that he had the right under the law and the exercise of his discretion to adopt that divisor. Therefore, it can not be said that there was anything illegal in the weighing of the mails, and in the ascertainment of the amounts to be paid under the weighing for either one of those years. That proposition, I think, is generally admitted in this discussion.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman was in when I made the proposition that there could be no form of divisor or any method of calculation adopted which would falsely give the average weight and thereby grant to a company compensation in excess of the compensation fixed by law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman now is talking from the standpoint of ethics and morals, and not of law.

Mr. WANGER. No.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. When a discretion is vested in a Department officer the Department officer may exercise that discretion, even though he exercise it unjustly. He may exercise it, possibly, in such a manner as not to carry out the real and best purpose of the law, and yet it is a valid exercise and one that the people and the Government will be governed by until it is changed. The gentleman's proposition is one of morals, and I admit the gentleman is right as a matter of morals, but as a proposition of law he is wrong.

Mr. WANGER. As a matter of law, the discretion of an executive officer will always be controlled when it is unjustly and improperly exercised, although the presumption will be in favor of its proper exercise.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, I decline to yield further, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; to a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if he contends that the law as it exists permits the Department to use discretion in the selection of divisors, and is not that fixed by law, although there may be an uncertainty as to what the law is?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is admitted by everybody who has taken part in this discussion, and it is supported by the opinion of the Attorney-General, that the Postmaster-General did have the discretion to employ six as the divisor, instead of seven.

Mr. WANGER. I want the gentleman to except one when he says it is admitted by everybody where it produces a false ascertainment. I wish it to appear on this record that there is one Member of this House who distinctly repudiates that doctrine.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is likely the gentleman from Pennsylvania has already made that statement, and I say it is not good as a proposition of law. Whenever the law vests in a court power to decide a question, that power carries with it the right to decide wrong as well as right, and when a discretion is vested in an executive officer and that discretion is exercised it is final. I think that is the opinion of the Postmaster-General. It is good law; it is sound law, anyhow.

Mr. WANGER. That may be the law in Indiana, but, thank God, it is not the law in Pennsylvania.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I think I ought not to yield further. I think I know more about the Pennsylvania law than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] if he makes the assertion that the courts can only decide correctly in that State, that they have the power only to decide right, because human nature is frail and liable to err, even in Pennsylvania.

Mr. WANGER. My only contention is that an abuse of discretion and exercise of power not conferred by law may be restrained. I ought to add that the function of ascertaining average weights is ministerial.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes, in order that I may make my point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I just want to make my point and then stop. I do not care to use any more time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman argue that we can not control the discretion of the Postmaster-General?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not argue any such thing. It is a question of applying the rules of the House. Congress can make any law it pleases; Congress has the power to make any direction or law respecting payments for carrying the mails that it chooses; but the question now is one of parliamentary procedure, of whether it can be done in an appropriation bill, a question of whether the Committee of the Whole, under the guise of a limitation, can propose an amendment which is pregnant with legislation that undertakes to control a discretion and directs things to be done which the law does not require to be done.

This amendment proposes that a certain amount of the appropriation shall be withheld until the Department reascertains the amount that is justly and morally due the railroad. It requires a reascertainment. It requires the application of Order 412 to two sections of the country that it would not be applicable to until the successive weighing periods arrive. Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe his amendment is obnoxious because it contains legislation. I want to put myself right on the main proposition. I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] is morally right, from the statement I have heard. If there has been a sufficient investigation of the question now to enable the Committee of the Whole to intelligently act, and if it comes before us regularly, I will support him in his amendment; but I am now discussing this question clearly as one of parliamentary law.

Mr. SULZER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SULZER. I would like to be heard for a few moments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule, but will recognize the gentleman if he will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, well, I would like to say a few words on the point of order. I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] and, in my opinion, it is pertinent, not subject to a point of order, and should be adopted. We have heard a great deal of discussion every year for the past decade regarding the railway charges—very exorbitant charges—for carrying the mail of the United States, and according to the admitted facts the Government is paying to-day and has been paying for years one-sixth more than it ought to pay, quite an item in the aggregate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the gentleman is confining himself to the point of order. The Chair is prepared to rule on the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a word more. In my opinion the point of order should be overruled, the amendment adopted, and I indulge the hope that the Department hereafter will weigh the mail properly, and see to it that the Government is not overcharged every year hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The CHAIRMAN. The item in the bill is as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, $44,000,000.

The Clerk will again read the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER].

The amendment was again read, as follows:

After the amendments in line 13, page 18, add:

"Provided further, That not exceeding six-sevenths of the amount ascertained pursuant to the weighing of the mail on any route in the year 1905 or in the year 1906 as the annual pay on such route for transporting the mail shall be paid out of the moneys hereby appropriated until such ascertainment shall have been readjusted in accordance with order of Postmaster-General Meyer No. 412, or until it shall have been finally determined by law that the first recited ascertainments are binding upon the Government for the ensuing fiscal year, notwithstanding any error or wrong in the basis of such ascertainments."

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that the amendment is obnoxious to the rules of the House because effecting a change of existing law, and the question is whether the amendment is a limitation upon the appropriation merely or whether it, in fact, changes the law. If it be a limitation upon the appropriation, it is clearly within the power of the House, and the House may appropriate $44,000,000, or it may appropriate $22,000,000, or it may make no appropriation at all, for the carrying of the mail. It might appropriate the full sum provided by law, or it might appropriate a proportionate portion of the sum provided by law. Undoubtedly a decision upon the amendment is along very close lines.

Last year, upon the consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] offered the following amendment at this same place in the bill:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in payment for transportation of the mails by railroad routes where the average weight of mails per day has been computed by the use of the divisor less than the whole number of days such mails have been weighed.

The occupant of the chair at that time, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER], being one of the most distinguished parliamentarians in the House, sustained the point of order, and in the course of his decision said:

The existing law has received a construction by the officers charged with the duty of administering it, and that construction the Chair feels bound to follow.

And then proceeded with the statement of his reasons that, in effect, the amendment then offered by the gentleman from Kansas would change the law and change the method of computing the amount due the railway companies. Undoubtedly that was the correct decision upon the proposition then before the House. To say that no part of that appropriation should be expended except upon a change of construction of the method of computation was, in effect, a change of law, though purporting to be a mere limitation.

But the present amendment is different. Since the ruling of last year the Department itself, without a change of law, has made a new construction of the existing law, and the present amendment does not propose to change the law in any respect, but is, as the Chair understands it, a mere direction to the disbursing officer of the Government that that officer shall not pay to exceed six-sevenths of the amount which otherwise he would pay until a further adjustment is ascertained either by the Department or, as could be by law, through the Court of Claims. It being within the power of the House to retain the whole of the amount due to the railroad company, it is clearly within the power of the House to retain any portion of the amount pending an adjudication and decision of the question as to the correct construction of the law as now made by the Department. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall occupy the attention of the House for only a minute or two, to conclude what I was going to say a few moments ago. I am glad that the Chairman overruled the point of order, and trust this amendment will now be adopted. I think it will have a beneficial effect and go far to check an evil of long standing in weighing the mail. For years the Post-Office Department has been weighing mail matter in the interest of the railroads, and the latter have benefited to the extent of millions and millions of dollars. This discrimination against the Government should be stopped, and stopped now. I am reliably informed that the amount of money the Government pays to the railroads every year for carrying the mails would duplicate all the mail cars in the country. The charges are excessive and the officials of the Department are responsible for it. In my judgment the Government is paying entirely too much for carrying the mails. The railroads do not pretend to charge shippers what they charge the Government for carrying the mail, and why the Government should be compelled to pay the railroads more is beyond my ken. It would be very much cheaper for the Government to buy the mail cars and pay the railroads for hauling them. I can not understand the excessive railroad charges for mail, never have understood it, and have never heard a satisfactory explanation of it. But let us adopt this amendment and endeavor to remedy the evil to some extent. That is the best we can do now, apparently.

Mr. Chairman, what I am saying now is for the purpose of calling the attention of the officials of the Post-Office Department to the startling facts in the matter, and I hope that hereafter the Post-Office officials will make better terms with the railroads regarding the pay for transporting the mails, and save the taxpayers millions of dollars every year. In my judgment, if the Post-Office officials were anxious to serve the best interests of the taxpayers, they would be able to make contracts with the railroad companies to carry the mails for 50 per cent of what is now being paid. As I said, the railroads are now and have been getting enough for carrying the mails every year to duplicate every mail car all over the United States. The $44,000,000 appropriated here is just about twice what it should be. The difference is a clear subsidy to the railroads. I hope hereafter that the Post-Office officials will make better terms with the railroads; and if they want to do so, I have no doubt they can do it. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize a gentleman on each side for five minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I would be glad that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], a member of the committee, be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota, a member of the committee.

[Mr. STEENERSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I do not doubt that almost every Member of the House favors the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER]; but I think it is due to another Member of this House, who has had service on the Post-Office Committee for a good many years and who has ably and faithfully represented his people and all the people of the country, that he should receive the credit due him.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I agree most heartily with that. If it had not been for the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] my attention would not have been directed to this subject probably. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIGGS. I am very glad to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] say that, and I am delighted over the death-bed repentance of my friend from Pennsylvania on this question.

On February 20 of last year the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] offered this amendment to the post-office appropriation bill:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in payment for transportation of the mails by railroad routes where the average weight of mails per day has been computed by the use of a divisor less than the whole number of days such mails have been weighed.

I favored that amendment then, and I say now that if there was any discoverer of this proposition in the legislative department, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] is entitled to be known as the discoverer of the wrong and the real author of this amendment, although I regret that he is not also the finisher of it.

We had a debate on this question on February 26 of last year, when I opposed the motion made by the chairman of the Post-Office Committee to suspend the rules and send the post-office appropriation bill to conference. I said then, just preceding Mr. MURDOCK's remarks, after having named several other propositions which we proposed to carry through the House by motion—

There is another amendment the House ought to have an opportunity to vote on right now, and that is the amendment of the Senate, known as the "Murdock amendment," the proposition offered in the committee, and known throughout the country as the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. This provides for making the weighing by the Post-Office Department of the mails speak the truth. That is all there is to it. That amendment provides that if you weigh the mails for a certain number of days, you shall use that number of days as a divisor to ascertain the average, and I defy any man to show me any rule in mathematics, in law, or in reason to use six as a divisor in order to obtain the average of seven daily weighings. All we ask upon that question is that these figures be made to speak the truth. You know they say figures do not lie, and they do not if they are made right, but if they are not right, they lie, and, as General Toombs, of Georgia, said once, "like the devil."

Being in charge of the time on this side, I then yielded some time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], who said this:

Mr. Speaker, as the post-office bill came originally to the House committee it had four provisions in it. By a special order two of those provisions were exposed to a point of order and two were saved from possible points of order. One of the provisions was the divisor proposition just mentioned by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS]. Yesterday the divisor proposition went back into the bill in the Senate, and was in the bill when the Senate passed that bill. Now, as the bill left the House, after final action by the House, the railway mail pay was cut in the region of two and one-half to three millions of dollars. As the bill left the Senate, after final passage through the Senate last night, railway mail pay is cut about $8,000,000. If you vote up the motion now to suspend the rules, I believe that every man here who votes for this motion, made by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, will vote to cut railway mail pay about $3,000,000. If he votes down that motion and against that motion, he cuts off an opportunity to concur in the Senate amendment and cut railway mail pay about $8,000,000. The issue is plain. I would like to see every Member of the House on record on that issue. The railway mail pay, which is the biggest thing in this bill, and which is one of the biggest single items of expenditure in any government, has been under impeachment for thirty-three years. It has been condemned time after time by Postmasters-General, and its correction has been attempted by four different commissions, each commission ending in a dog fall. Now, this Congress has come up to the point of cutting down the railway mail pay. Are you going to side step the opportunity or are you going to be courageous and cut it what it ought to be cut? That is all I have to say.

That amendment was as good last year as it is to-day. It was as germane last year as it is to-day. I believed then that the ruling of the chairman (I forget who was the chairman then) was wrong. I am certain, and I congratulate the House and the country, that the ruling of the chairman to-day [Mr. MANN] is correct on that question, because it gives this House an opportunity to vote on it, as it ought to have done last year. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, some time ago I sent to the desk an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, which seems to have been overlooked, and I ask if it will be in order now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee the following: "or any patent medicine or compound containing more than 3 per cent alcohol."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, is that to some paragraph that has already been passed?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is directed to an amendment already adopted offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is the amendment to which this amendment is addressed properly before the committee at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana make a point of order on this amendment?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; but I wanted to find out first to what it is addressed.

The CHAIRMAN. For the information of the House the Clerk may read the amendment to which the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is addressed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 18, amend by adding after the end of line 13, the words "provided no part of said sum shall be used to pay for the carrying in the mails of any malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors or intoxicating liquors of any kind, or any cocaine or derivatives thereof, nor any patent medicine or compound containing more than 3 per cent alcohol."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to add to the amendment already agreed to by the committee on this same paragraph, the committee not having passed the paragraph, is in order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I will accept the amendment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. This decision is in conformity with the ruling for many years. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. KÜSTERMANN) there were—ayes 21, noes 30.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of freight or expressage on postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and empty mail bags, $300,000. And the Postmaster-General shall require, when in freightable lots and whenever practicable, the withdrawal from the mails of all postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, in the respective weighing divisions of the country, immediately preceding the weighing period in said divisions, and thereafter such postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, shall be transmitted by either freight or express.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I observe with great regret that there is no provision in this bill for the extension of the parcels post. I use the word "extension" advisedly, for we have already a sort of lame parcels post in this country; but I believe that the majority of the inhabitants of the United States are not aware of this fact. They have a vague idea that some kinds of merchandise may be sent by mail, but they do not know that we have a sort of halfway parcels post. The Postal Guide published by the Department will not elucidate the question to anybody seeking for information. There is a great air of mystery around the whole subject which can not be dispelled by an investigation of the index in this guide. It is true that the index of the Postal Guide refers to the parcels post as established by the postal convention with foreign countries, but I defy anybody who is not an expert in the matter to locate exactly where in the postal guide may be found the provisions for our domestic parcels post. They may be found under the heading of third and fourth class mail matter, but the index makes no reference thereto, except by inference. As the law is at present constituted, packages up to 4 pounds in weight are carried throughout the United States. The charge for small parcels is 4 cents for a quarter of a pound, 8 cents for a half pound, and 16 cents for a pound; enormously dear as compared to the European systems, but by far the cheapest way to send a package in the United States.

There are several bills before the committees of the House and of the Senate for the extension of our parcels post. It is not my ambition or intention now to offer for the consideration of the House a perfected scheme for parcels post. I wish merely to debate, in the short time I have, the general proposition. I, personally, am willing to vote for any one of the bills, or any amendment to this bill, which will perfect the inefficient system of parcels post which now exists.

It was once said by a great statesman of the last decade that there were six reasons why there ought not to be a parcels post in this country, and those six reasons were the six express companies. [Laughter.]

Now, this may have been true of his day, and to some extent it may be true to-day, but I am inclined to think that so far as the membership of this House is concerned a very much higher motive regulates those who are called upon to pass on this question. There are several grounds of opposition to the extension of the parcels post. In the first place, the claim is made on both sides of the House that such legislation is paternalistic. This statement apparently does not take into account the fact that we have already a parcels post, nor can it be urged with any more success now against the parcels post than similar objections were urged one hundred and twenty years ago in the Continental Congress and in the first sessions of the Congress of the United States against the establishment of the post-office itself.

Another source of objection is uncertainty as to the cost of such an establishment. My friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] made an excellent speech on this subject a few days ago. He has received communications from the postmasters-general of four or five of the leading European countries, answering his requests for information as to whether their parcels post pays for itself—and the answer leans generally to the affirmative. Whether or not this would be so in our country I will not venture to say. Of one thing I am certain, the establishment of a parcels post on our rural free-delivery routes is bound to pay its own way and to make a profit, besides proving the greatest boon to our farmers.

Still a third class of objections comes from the country stores. I have received many letters on the subject—and I have no doubt all of my colleagues here have had the same experience—purporting to come from representatives of the country stores. These letters display no interest whatever in the public welfare or in the pressing needs of the community, but violently assail the parcels post, as proposed, from their own selfish standpoint. To them I would say that the big department stores will be unable to submerge them through the medium of the parcels post. The best argument in support of this is found in the very countries where the parcels post is now most efficient—in England and France. We have no store in New York more perfectly organized than Harrod's stores in London. The saying is that one can purchase there everything from a feather bed to a white elephant. And this is only one of many similar stores in London and Paris. And yet every little town in Great Britain, in spite of the excellent parcels post, or perhaps because of it, supports as many substantial and prosperous retail shops as like communities in the United States.

Anyone who has had any experience in the foreign countries of Europe will, I think, recognize the value of the parcels post, and will greet with enthusiasm any suggestion to establish a similar system in this country. It is one of the many conveniences of life which may be found in foreign countries and in which we, I am sorry to say, are lacking.

Now, as to the express companies, it is true that they have had a very creditable part in the development of civilization in the United States, but I submit for the consideration of this day and generation that conditions which existed when the express companies were established no longer prevail throughout the United States and can no longer be urged in excuse of the existence of the express companies. The first express company in my State, the State of New York, was established in 1841, to supplement the railroad service in the transmission of packages. At that time one expressman with a carpet bag carried all the express parcels from New York to Buffalo, and I want to show you what he had to do in order to carry them and why an express system was necessary.

At that time the means of conveyance between New York and Buffalo were by rail to Auburn, N. Y., then by stage from Auburn to Geneva, then by rail again from Geneva to Rochester, and then by mail coach or by private conveyance to Buffalo. The voyage took four nights and three days and was made once a week. Under those circumstances it was obviously impossible, since there was no one company performing the duties of transportation throughout all this section of country, for the railroads to do it, and that was the reason, I apprehend, why the express company was started in our State. Another instance, and one still more striking as an excuse for the formation of express companies, was the situation that existed throughout the great West about the end of the fifties. California gold had been discovered, but there was no means of transmitting parcels or the mail across those great desert barren spaces of our country excepting through the kindness of some sturdy pioneer or argonaut who was crossing in a prairie schooner, and so the California pony express was founded, the forefather of the present Wells Fargo Company, from St. Joseph, Mo., the end of the railroad and of the telegraph line——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the California Pony Express started from St. Joseph, Mo., at the end of the railway and of the telegraph line, and by successive relays of ponies, running the perils of the Indians and traversing the vast alkali plains of what are now the States of Nevada and Utah, accomplished the distance from St. Joseph to San Francisco in ten days, and charged $5 apiece for letters that were so transmitted. Their business expanded enormously, and they soon became most useful and trustworthy agents in the development of the country. People used to intrust all their most precious possessions to the Wells-Fargo Company, ranging from a bag of gold dust up to a baby.

I have discussed these questions before the committee because I want to be fair to the express companies. I wish to establish a reason for their creation and the necessity for their existence during long years of our development. But as matters exist to-day I can not see any reason for the existence of express companies, nor any excuse for advancing the suggestion that the express companies are so valuable that we do not need a parcels post. On the contrary, I maintain that the parcels post is coming and the express companies must go.

At the present time there is an extraordinary network of railroads which traverse this country in every direction, and the work of the transportation of packages is performed by the railroad companies and not by the express companies. Now, let us see what the express companies do for you. Suppose that you and I were residents of small towns, perhaps in the same State. I want to send you an express package. I take it myself down to the railroad station. I give it over to the express agent. I pay him and he puts it on the train. The railway company transports it to the other small town, and when it gets there gives the package over to the express agent. The express agent there then notifies you sooner or later that there is an express parcel waiting for you in the station, which you have to send for and get yourself. In other words, the express company does nothing except collect a tax which is exorbitant, unwarranted, and unequaled in any other country in the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In these piping times of "trust busting" I have often wondered why the attention of some of these eminent "trust busters" has not been directed to the express companies.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am not eminent in the business, but I am doing my best to get the Ways and Means Committee to investigate the matter. I introduced a resolution, I had a hearing, but I have not heard from the committee. It still has the matter out here somewhere.

Mr. HARRISON. I admire the gentleman's temerity and wish him success.

This is the biggest trust in the country. It is the best organized and it is the best worked. It has divided the United States into six or eight provinces or satrapies, and nobody can transmit express parcels except under the regulations of the express companies met in convention, as applied through the machination of the satrap located where the unfortunate individual happens to reside.

Let me give you one instance—and there are, no doubt, hundreds of others—where the wonderful machinery of the express trust was displayed. A friend of mine in New York a few years ago desired to ship some horses across the continent. He applied to three or four railway companies in New York. Each one of them said that there was only one way of doing this, and that was by sending them by the Wells-Fargo Express Company. My friend went to the Southern Pacific Company and said:

I do not want to send these horses by express. I want to send them by freight for one-quarter of the cost.

The railroad company said, "We can not do that. They must be sent by Wells-Fargo Express." My friend produced a letter in which this railway company had agreed several years before to send his horses by freight across the continent, and the Southern Pacific Company capitulated. This is of interest to show how perfect this trust is. If you apply to any railroad company in instances of this sort they will, if possible, refer you to some express company for performing the same service. [Applause.]

But the day of reckoning is at hand. In ever increasing numbers Americans are traveling abroad. We are learning what the convenience of the parcels post means to the people of those communities, and how blessed they are in their freedom from our express trust and its extortionate charges. The time is not far distant, in my opinion, when the people of the United States will demand that our Government shall assume the responsibilities of a perfected parcels post, and thereby add to the comfort and happiness of life here one of the greatest conveniences of modern times.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is their objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask unanimous consent to put a few lines in the RECORD from a volume I have here, entitled "The Truth About Trusts," by John Moody, in which reference is made to this "express trust." It will not take much of the RECORD, and there is a great deal of information in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] asks permission to have inserted in the RECORD a few lines.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. A page and a half of the book.

The CHAIRMAN. On the express question. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE EXPRESS TRUST.

The following leading express companies, though distinct corporations, are, in effect, a trust, as they operate in harmony and are, for the most part, directly allied through financial interests:

ADAMS EXPRESS COMPANY.

Formed in 1854 as a joint stock association. It operates express routes on more than 50,000 miles of railroad, embracing the Pennsylvania, the New York, New Haven and Hartford, the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy, and other systems. It controls the Southern Express Company, which operates throughout the entire South, and in the spring of 1903 it purchased the Morris European and American Express Company, which does an express business between this country and Europe and to different points in Europe.

Capital stock $12,000,000, on which dividends are paid at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, with extra dividends. In 1903 8 per cent was declared in all. The company also has outstanding $12,000,000 in 4 per cent collateral debentures, due 1948. These debentures were given to stockholders in 1898 to represent a division of the accumulated profits of the company.

AMERICAN EXPRESS COMPANY.

Formed under New York laws in 1839 and 1868 as a joint stock association. Operates in express business on about 45,000 miles of railroad in the United States, including the Boston and Maine, various Vanderbilt lines, Illinois Central, and others. In the spring of 1903 it purchased control of the Westcott Express Company, which does a local business in New York City and vicinity.

Capital, $18,000,000. Dividends, 8 per cent per annum. No bonds.

UNITED STATES EXPRESS COMPANY.

Formed under New York laws as a joint stock association in 1854. Operates an express business upon about 30,000 miles of railroads in the United States, covering the Lehigh Valley, Lackawanna, Rock Island, St. Paul, and Baltimore and Ohio systems. It acquired, in 1887, the Baltimore and Ohio Express Company, and in 1903 the Metropolitan Express Company.

Capital stock, $10,000,000; par, $100. Dividends paid, 4 per cent per annum. No bonds.

WELLS, FARGO & CO.

Formed under Colorado laws February 5, 1866. The company operates an express business on about 45,000 miles of railroad and steamer lines, the main territory being in the West. It also does an important banking business.

Capital stock, $8,000,000. Dividends paid, 8 per cent per annum. No bonds.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. CAPRON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendment, bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 15444. An act extending the time for the construction of a dam across Rainy River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 903) to amend section 2, chapter 433, Thirtieth Statutes at Large, entitled "An act to confirm title to lots 13 and 14, in square 959, in Washington, D. C.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For railway post-office car service, $4,800,000.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, we will never see the end of our post-office deficit unless we come down to business methods. Here, again, nearly $5,000,000 is asked for the renting of mail cars. Last year we paid $5,743,444 for the same purpose. Now, then, it is a fact that we can build and own all mail cars necessary for the service for about four times the annual rental. I have looked over the reports and I find such cases as these:

From Brookfield, Wis., to McGregor, Iowa, a distance of 182 miles: Annual cost of transportation of mail between these two points, $31,434.98; annual rental of one 50-foot car, $7,272.

From Milwaukee, Wis., to Ishpeming, Mich., a distance of 309 miles: Annual cost of transportation of mail between these two points, $68,576.40; annual rental of six cars, $32,866; average rental per car, $5,474.57.

From Granger, Wyo., to Huntington, Oreg., a distance of 541 miles: Annual cost of transportation of mail between these two points, $203,633.29; annual rental of three cars, $35,228.25; average rental per car, $11,742.75.

From Pasco to Tacoma, Wash., a distance of 254 miles: Annual cost of transportation of mail between these two points, $47,278.34; annual rental of one car, $6,337.25.

From Los Angeles, Cal., to Yuma, Ariz., a distance of 249 miles: Annual cost of transportation of mail between these two points, $31,941.42; annual rental of one car, $6,223.59.

Now, running through the entire report, I find the average rental for the 50 or 60 foot cars to be from $6,000 to $7,000 per year, and I have it on the best of authority that only $16,000 to $20,000 would be the cost of building a car and equipping it. If that is true, and I believe it is, we ought to take speedy steps to build our own cars and not continue to pay these high rentals. While I know nothing can be done regarding this matter at the present time, I do hope the post-office authorities and the Post-Office Committee will take up this matter and suggest at the next session of Congress some way to stop this squandering of the people's money.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this paragraph and the amendment thereto close in two minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will not occupy but two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] moves that debate upon the pending paragraph and the amendment thereto close in two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, this item for the railway postal-car service, this decreased appropriation, is one upon which the Congress of the United States is to be congratulated for having brought about a reduction by recent legislation enacted here. I want to put in the RECORD merely a statement that there has been a change of practice in the Department within the last year, and that we are now paying on 40 feet of space in 70-foot cars, the Department having started a system of paying for part of a car. During the past years, since this system began, in 1873, the Government has paid for cars that were exclusively used for mail. Now there has been a slight change in the system, and I merely want to get it into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for future Congressmen to read.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this paragraph has closed, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Railway mail service: For 11 division superintendents, at $3,000 each; 11 assistant division superintendents, at $2,000 each; 5 assistant superintendents, at $2,000 each; 19 assistant superintendents, at $1,800 each; 131 chief clerks, at $1,800 each; 271 clerks, class 6, at not exceeding $1,600 each; 1,274 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,500 each; 530 clerks, class 5, at not exceeding $1,400 each; 2,100 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,300 each; 2,225 clerks, class 4, at not exceeding $1,200 each; 5,800 clerks, class 3, at not exceeding $1,100 each; 2,100 clerks, class 2, at not exceeding $1,000 each; 810 clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $900 each; 800 clerks, class 1, at not exceeding $800 each; in all, $18,588,000: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, in his discretion, under such regulations as he may provide, allow a clerk who is sick leave of absence with pay, his duties to be performed without expense to the Government during the period for which he is granted leave, not exceeding thirty days in any fiscal year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask some gentleman, a member of the committee, or the gentleman from Kansas, how much money is appropriated in this bill to carry Government bonds, Government securities, and Government moneys through the mails in competition, I may say, in this express octopus?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is no appropriation in this bill covering that item.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, why do we not appropriate some money, and send some of our public moneys, etc., through the mails and create competition with this express octopus? I am asking the question seriously, I assure the gentleman, and this is not the first time I have inquired into this matter.

I want to say this, Mr. Chairman, in the early part of the session I introduced a resolution which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, to investigate the question of hauling these Government moneys, bonds, and securities, to find out what rates were paid the express companies—what rates were paid when we hauled them by mail. Well, I have not been able to get any report from the committee. The resolutions have been lodged in that great committee for months.

I was given a hearing a few minutes, with some promises made. As I understand the situation, the same rates are being paid we paid forty years ago, and the American people and the American Government are robbed, as the record shows, by the same "express trust" rates. The contract we have is forty years old. The same contract is continued from year to year at the same old rate! We are hauling about "forty" times more money, about "forty" times more bonds in quantity or value, and a hundredfold, I dare say, more securities than we did forty years ago, and at the same rate; and the American Government as a government, and the American people as a people are being charged the same rates by this New York octopus, for that is where its head is, and its tail is over in the Golden Gate, and its head in Hell's Gate [great laughter], and nobody knows where its intentions are, and it is robbing the American people and "gulping" from the American Treasury. The fact is that we can carry these Government moneys and property from Treasury to subtreasury, and from bivouac to bivouac, as it were, to the Army and Navy, I may say, and from one side of the country to the other through the mails, and pay but a very small insurance, and possibly without it, and save money, but we do not try to do it. Banks are sending their money in part through the mails. They insure it for an infinitesimal expense, and the Treasurer spoke of this.

It goes through safely in my own State and through other States in the United States with and without insurance. Yet, Mr. Chairman, there has been no arrangement under a Democratic or a Republican Administration, I may say, to establish a service by mail to compete with this New York, with this United States octopus, that my distinguished friend [Mr. HARRISON] has just talked about. Now, I say that is another reform——

Mr. KEIFER. Can the gentleman give us any instance where the Government sends out bonds from the Treasury through the mails?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All I know, I will say to my friend, is what I see—the expense of hauling Government "money," etc., in the Government reports.

Mr. KEIFER. Then you do not mean bonds?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I mean to state that substantially.

Mr. KEIFER. Bonds are not sent through the mails.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think the reports show I am correct, but confine it to money and securities; some of it, a little, an infinitesimal part, is being sent through the mails, and the great balance is sent by the express companies, and the Government of the United States is being held up annually and has to pay deficiencies every year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want another minute.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move that all debate upon the paragraph be closed in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that all debate upon the paragraph be closed in two minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, Mr. Chairman, feebly as I may, and in a nonpartisan way, you must see, and hurriedly, I have called your attention to this, a place where the Government of the United States as a government and the American people as a people are being robbed by this express octopus. Now, I say it is the duty of that great Ways and Means Committee to bring that report out. It is also the duty of this great Congress, Mr. Chairman, to legislate on this subject; it is the duty of the great Postmaster-General Meyer or "General" CLAY or "General" MUDD, or anybody else [great laughter], the heads of our great Departments, to bring about a reform that will stop this outrage perpetrated on the Federal Treasury and the American people. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate is exhausted, and the Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

For actual and necessary expenses of division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks, Railway Mail Service, and railway postal clerks, while actually traveling on business of the Post-Office Department and away from their several designated headquarters, $20,000.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 21, in line 8, after the word "Department," all of lines 8, 9, and 10, and insert "$2,020,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, after the word "Department," in line 8, strike out the words "and away from their several designated headquarters, $20,000," and insert "$2,020,000."

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment——

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, is it in order for him to reserve a point of order after the debate has begun.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there has been no debate on the subject.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Ohio had proceeded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is reserved in time.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to allow to railway mail clerks their actual expenses while in the discharge of their duties.

Under existing law provision is made for the actual expenses of division superintendents, assistant division superintendents, and chief clerks in the Railway Mail Service. The railway postal clerks are also included, but you will find that the amount appropriated heretofore was but $20,000; that amount is again asked in this bill and the result will be that we have simply covered the expenses of all the other employees except the railway mail clerks. There has also been a construction made by the Department on this provision, to wit, "and away from their several designated headquarters," which excludes railway mail clerks; so that while we are carrying, and have for years carried them in the permanent law, railway mail clerks are excluded; they are also excluded by reason of the failure of Congress to make the necessary appropriation. By my amendment I seek to strike out the words "and away from their several designated headquarters," and I am inserting $2,020,000 to meet the requirements of this act.

You will also observe that the whole subject as to how this amount shall be audited or expended is left with the Department, and the provision applicable now to all the other employees will be applicable to the railway mail clerks. So that in substance it will provide for an appropriation which will authorize the Post-Office Department to regulate and audit their expenses, and permit that Department to pay to these railway mail clerks their actual expenses incurred while in the performance of their duty. It has always seemed to me that it is wholly unfair to permit the expenses to be paid to all the other employees and refuse so far as the railway mail clerks were concerned. I ascertained from the Department that in order to adjust this compensation it will require during the next fiscal year $2,000,000; adding that to the amount which the bill carries—to wit, $20,000—my amendment will enable the Department to act fairly and justly toward these railway mail clerks. I hope, therefore, in the interest of justice and fairness to these men, that my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I favor this amendment. Yesterday this Committee of the Whole raised one grade of city letter carriers a million dollars. The city letter carrier is a delightful man. He has a constituency. He appeals to the political imagination of the man in his district. The rural carrier is a delightful man. He appeals to the political imagination of the man in the country; but the clerk in the postal car belongs neither to the city nor to the country, but belongs to both; and I submit to this House that this man in the postal car is one of the most skilled public employees that we have. He has the most hazardous employment of any man in the Government service, not excepting the soldier of the Army or the sailor of the Navy. Do you know what the postal clerk has to do in the way of skill? He has to know the schedules of four or five States, to know every connection between railroads in those States, and know every change of train schedule and connection, in order to be able to throw into the proper compartment any letter addressed to any town in those four States, distributing each to the right railroad, according to the latest schedule of time-table, and he has to do it under examination at a grade of 99 per cent plus, or within 1 per cent of perfection.

In this country the postal clerks at examinations as a class threw cards as near perfection as 99.42 per cent. That is a matter of skill. Everyone knows what their position is in the way of hazard. In 1907, for the fiscal year, there were 757 postal clerks injured and 21 postal clerks in this country killed. When a wreck takes place your postal clerk is up in front next to the engineer, who is paid twice as much as he, and he is among the tangled and shattered rails, splintered ties, and escaping steam when the crash that brings death with it comes.

What about the other traveling employees of the Postal Department? Where is your inspector in the wreck? Back in the Pullman with a per diem of $5 a day in safety and comfort. There is not a single employee of the Postal Department who travels for the Government but who gets travel pay. Your ocean mail carrier not only gets travel pay; he is also a first-cabin passenger. The postal clerks go out over the line next to the engine, in a hazardous place, exercising a large degree of skill, having irregular hours, and they get no travel pay at all. I believe it was the intention of some earlier Congress to give them travel pay, because the language so indicates. But this House has a chance to-day to do these men justice. You have taken care of the carrier both in the country and in the city, and why not take care of the men who travel out at irregular hours in a dangerous occupation and with skill serve this Government at the very center of the postal system? Because you can take away the city carrier and the system will go on; you can remove the rural carrier and you still have the postal system; you can even take away the local post-offices; but if you remove the very center of this system, if you remove this skilled distributing force, your system will fall.

Here is an article from the Wichita Eagle of the issue of March 9 last, apropos of what I have just said:

MADE SOME HIGH RECORDS—POSTAL CLERKS MADE GREAT ANNUAL EXAMINATIONS.

Railway postal clerks of the Wichita division made a record last month in case examinations, which is probably the best of the entire country, and if they are not proud of it they should be.

Seventy-four examinations were passed by clerks in this division and the average per cent of all was 99.42 correct. That is getting mighty near perfect in case examinations.

In the seventy-four examinations 68,167 cards were handled, and of that number but 394 were thrown incorrectly.

This division has been one of the best in examination records for years, but the record of last month is the best yet made by the clerks under Clyde M. Reed, chief clerk of the Wichita division.

There are over 200 regular railway postal clerks in this division, and about twenty substitutes. Most of these clerks are required to throw two examinations each year, but there are some who are examined but once in a year. The substitutes are examined as fast as they can prepare for examinations, the object being to have them learn the distribution of mail as soon as possible.

February, March, October, and November are the months when most of the examinations are taken. The month just passed was unusual for the number of examinations held, as well as the record made for good examinations.

An examination of a railway postal clerk consists in having him distribute cards marked with the names of the towns in the State on which he is being examined, into a miniature sort of post-office case. Each card must be thrown into the right box. It is a severe test and unless the clerk has studied hard and has at the tip of his tongue the county in which every post-office is located and the route or railroad which supplies the post-office with mail, he will not be able to pass the examination. It is required that he must pass an examination making at least a per cent correct of 98.

The examinations of clerks become less frequent with his lengthening term of service. If a clerk has reached the age of 45 years and has been in the service for more than twelve years, he will be called upon for examination but once each year. But a clerk must pass examinations on every State for which he "works" mail. This means that on some runs the clerks are examined on several States and so they are called for examination twice each year.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What is the pay of these men?

Mr. MURDOCK. It runs from $800 to $1,600; the lowest grade in the service gets $800.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Are they allowed any traveling expenses?

Mr. MURDOCK. Not at all. But here is a chance to do these men justice, and this House can do it.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What is proposed by this amendment?

Mr. MURDOCK. The proposition is in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, to raise the amount in the paragraph at the top of page 21 to $2,020,000, which will permit the Department to give the postal clerks actual expenses—in some cases, on the small lines, it will be a matter of 50 cents a day, and on the great through lines it may be $1.50 a day; but the proposition is to give each postal clerk not a per diem but his actual expenses on a voucher submitted to the Department.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will it take $2,000,000 to do that?

Mr. MURDOCK. It will.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any limitation placed on the expense?

Mr. GOEBEL. Let me say to the House that the whole matter will be under the direction and supervision of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there to be no limit on what is to be allowed in the way of expenses?

Mr. GOEBEL. The discretion is in the Department.

Mr. MADDEN. How many men are there in the service?

Mr. MURDOCK. Fourteen thousand men who actually travel; about 7,000 are men on the smaller lines, and their expenses would be small, probably one meal away from home in a day. About 7,000 are on the great through lines, and their expenses might reach $1.50, and in some cases I expect above that.

Mr. MADDEN. How was the amount of $2,000,000 reached?

Mr. GOEBEL. It was reached by the Department figuring an average of 50 cents a day per man.

Mr. MADDEN. For the 14,000 men for every day in the year?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes.

Mr. McDERMOTT. According to these figures there would be 16,087 men.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman is going to make a computation, I want to say that about 2,000 of these men do not travel.

Mr. McDERMOTT. Do not they all travel?

Mr. MURDOCK. They do not.

Mr. McDERMOTT. If you raise every one of them from one grade, up to the division superintendent, it will amount to $1,608,700.

Mr. MURDOCK. This is not a proposition to raise the salary; this is a proposition to give them their traveling expenses. This House has before it the plain proposition. It knows the service. There is not a man here who has not seen a railway postal clerk working in his car at night. He knows how skilled and how hazardous that occupation is. He can now do justice to that service by voting for this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, a point of order has been made against the paragraph, and I suggest that we determine the point of order and then proceed with the debate on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] on the point of order.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, upon the question as to whether a point of order lies, I beg to say this, that all that my amendment proposes to do is to increase the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand the gentleman's amendment. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio inform the Chair? As the Chair understands, the item in the bill as it stands authorizes the payment of necessary and actual expenses while traveling away from their several headquarters, and the gentleman offers an amendment which authorizes the payment of expenses while at their designated headquarters.

Mr. GOEBEL. That follows, Mr. Chairman, because of the construction that I have said the Department placed upon this item. I am now trying to avoid that construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is asking what the law is. Is there any law now providing for the payment of expenses of these officials at any place?

Mr. GOEBEL. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Except the appropriation act.

Mr. GOEBEL. Except the appropriation act.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any other law upon the subject?

Mr. GOEBEL. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to suggest the difficulty in the mind of the Chair. As the law is now construed in operation, either through general law or the appropriation act, there is authority granted to pay the traveling expenses of these railway postal clerks only when they are away from their headquarters. Now, the gentleman proposes to change that and authorizes the payment at the designated headquarters of the same officials. That of course would be clearly in itself a change of law unless the gentleman has some authority for it. Not only would it be a change of law, but the gentleman's proposition carries with it an appropriation of $2,000,000 for a purpose nowhere authorized by law so far as the Chair is informed. Has the gentleman any law which would provide for the payment of the traveling or necessary expenses of these officials while at their designated headquarters?

Mr. GOEBEL. No. My amendment proposes to strike out the language "and away from their several designated headquarters," simply to avoid the construction, whether rightly or wrongly, of the Department——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that is for the purpose of changing the law. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer an amendment.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, then I want to amend by striking out simply "$20,000" and inserting "$2,020,000" in its place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 9, page 21, after "headquarters," insert "two million," so as to read:

"Two million and twenty thousand dollars."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will be disagreed to. Twenty thousand dollars is practically all that could be used for this purpose, and the purpose for which the gentleman from Ohio intends, it is quite clear, would not follow, because he himself admits that the expenses of the clerks could not be paid under the present language of the statute. Therefore there is no occasion to increase the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. GOEBEL. I did not say that. I say under a construction which may be wholly wrong, and which we may afterwards convince the Department is wrong; but unless we make the appropriation it would avail nothing.

Mr. OVERSTREET. It might help some to remind the gentleman of the decision of the Court of Claims which sustains that construction. This item of appropriation is intended to pay expenses of officials named in the paragraph when they are sent off on duties other than those which they perform at their headquarters. It has been endeavored to determine by suit in the Court of Claims that a railway postal clerk would be entitled to his expense when he is in the discharge of his duties and on his route upon the train. But the court held that he was not absent from his headquarters, although he was in the discharge of his duties away from the city of his residence, because his headquarters is the headquarters where his duty is discharged, namely, upon the train. Consequently the increase of the appropriation could not possibly avail in increasing the payment of the expenses, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] evidently intends. And inasmuch as it would not avail anything it would be a foolish appropriation.

Mr. MADDEN. The point, then, is that no travel allowance can be made under that decision except when the person to whom the allowance is made is on special duty?

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is right.

Mr. MADDEN. And does the chairman of the committee wish to convey the information to the House that the amendment is not properly in order because of the fact that the postal clerk is not on special duty, but that his service is in the discharge of his regular duty?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Certainly. There is no more justification, I may say, in allowing the expenses of the postal clerk than there would be in allowing the expenses of the city carrier for his daily lunch or the expense of the rural carrier for his lunch, because they are in the discharge of their duties at the hours when they are away from their homes and, as a rule, they pay that expense themselves.

Mr. MURDOCK. And if the gentleman will allow me, there is an allowance here for street-car fares and the carrier has an allowance for horse hire, has he not?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the railway mail clerk rides just as well as the city carrier. He rides on the fast trains. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be disagreed to.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, the reason offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] seems to me to be technical and does not go to the merit of the proposition. Here we have been carrying a provision for the benefit of the railway mail clerks for I do not know how many years, in the same class with division superintendents and others, allowing to them their expenses. But Congress has failed to make an appropriation for the railway mail clerks. That is all there is about that. But the Department says the act does not apply to railway mail clerks, because Congress did not make enough of an appropriation so as to include them, and by a construction it maintains that clerks are not, while on duty, "away from their headquarters." The fault lies in not making the appropriation. If the objection that has been urged against part of my amendment, that it is a violation of existing law, I am willing to let the latter provision of the act remain. Let us make, then, the appropriation, and leave it to the Department to determine hereafter as to whether or not the appropriation can be made available.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, my friend asks what is the use of making this appropriation, and says that it is idle. I ask, What harm can there be if you make this appropriation?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield to a question right there?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I understand the gentleman is a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads?

Mr. GOEBEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Can the gentleman give the committee any information as to whether or not this money will probably be used for that purpose if appropriated by the committee?

Mr. GOEBEL. The act now provides for the actual and necessary expenses of railway postal clerks.

Mr. OVERSTREET. When away from their headquarters.

Mr. GOEBEL. So that this amount of money, if the appropriation is made, will be used for that purpose. However, there is included in the original act other employees. Now, is it idle to make the appropriation? What harm can there be in making it? If by law or any construction of the Post-Office Department they can not get it, the amount simply reverts back into the Treasury. But let us be fair. Why have you for years and years carried this provision in the appropriation bills and failed to make the appropriation? You are paying the expenses of the other employees mentioned in this item, why make this distinction as to these clerks? All I am asking is not to change the law, but to make the appropriation in order that the Department might determine whether railway mail clerks come within the provisions of the present law, and that there may be no further excuse on the part of the Department to withhold the expenses for lack of an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I do not question the efficiency and worth of the railway mail clerks, or that this branch of the service is very well conducted and most efficiently directed, but I do wish to take issue with the statement made here in this debate that there are no other men in the postal service that require the same high efficiency that is required in the railway mail service, for many of the high-grade distributing clerks in our large post-offices must have the same expert knowledge.

The claim has been made here that we make no allowance to these railway mail clerks for their expenses while traveling in the performance of their duties. I wish to say to the committee that since I have been a member of the Post-Office Committee I have always understood that one of the reasons for the difference in the rate of pay to railway mail clerks, as distinguished from that given to post-office clerks, in which latter the maximum is $1,200, and in the railway mail clerks, where the maximum is $1,600, that Congress, following the suggestion of the committee, thought it was better and more economical administration to include in the salaries a lump-sum allowance for expenses, rather than portioning it out in piecemeal by a separate allowance, which would be subject to all kinds of abuse.

That is one of the reasons that accounts for the difference between the salaries of the railway mail clerks and the salaries of the post-office clerks. This year, for the first time in several years, I wish to call to the attention of the House, we have made provision so that every railway mail clerk will be able to get his promotion according to the scale in force in the Department, it having been called to the attention of the Department officials at the hearings that their estimate was inadequate to meet that scale of pay, and we have added $164,000 and made provision for the increased number in the respective grades, thereby giving to 1,600 clerks a promotion, in some instances of $100 and in a few instances of $200, so that every railway mail clerk can have no complaint against the action of the committee in not making adequate appropriations to permit of the prescribed promotions according to the scale adopted by the Department.

The committee last year recommended, and the House adopted the recommendation, increasing every railway mail clerk's salary $100.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. STAFFORD. We raised the salary of every railway mail clerk $100, thereby raising by that amount the highest compensation paid to the clerks in the respective classes. For my part I voted for and supported that amendment because I recognized that the expenses of the railway mail clerk were increasing and believed that the committee was justified in raising them so as to provide for their increasing expenses, but not in this crude form, as suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, appropriating $2,000,000 without any restrictions whatsoever, and not to be expended under the direction of the Postmaster-General according to a system that he might devise, because there is nothing carried in the bill here that limits the expenditure—but just the amount of $2,000,000 is added without any limitation whatever. For my part, I believe if these salaries are inadequate it would be better to make a lump increase in salaries according to the character of service which requires an absence from home than by an allowance which is subject to all manner of abuse, as is exemplified in the per diem allowance to field inspectors, which can not be corrected or restricted to prevent the abuse.

This year, believing that the diminishing receipts from the postal service because of the depression in business in the last five months did not justify increasing salaries over what was required in the present law, the committee deferred making any provision for other increases. The Department confirms us in that decision by showing the diminished receipts from the different post-offices.

Think of it for one minute, gentlemen, that in the city of New York, which has total receipts of $20,000,000, during the period of October their receipts fell off $150,000 over those of the corresponding month of last year; during the month of November the business ran down so that the receipts were little less than the preceding year. In December, as the postmaster says, the receipts would have been decreased if it had not been that one large firm deposited, out of course, 70,000 postal cards in the post-office for distribution throughout the country. In January the receipts showed a reduction of 5 per cent; in February, a reduction of 3 per cent; and this condition has prevailed not only in New York, but in Philadelphia, in Chicago, and in every large city where the postal receipts are large and where we derive the large part of the revenues to maintain the postal service.

We provided last year an appropriation for a twelve-million-dollar increase during the present fiscal year alone in the salaries of city and rural letter carriers, post-office and railway mail clerks. In this bill we provide $2,050,000 increases of salaries for promotions of clerks in the post-offices of the first and second class under the classification act.

We provide $1,300,000 more for increases of salaries to the letter-carrier force and several hundred thousand dollars for increase in the salaries of the railway mail clerks, and we go before the country and say that we have done adequately and sufficiently for the carriers and the post-office and railway mail clerks under existing conditions of greatly diminished postal receipts and with the expectation of a deficit in the revenues for this fiscal year approaching $12,000,000 to $15,000,000, and which during the ensuing fiscal year might aggregate $20,000,000 or more. We did not feel warranted, under the peculiar conditions existing, to bring into the House a bill which meant an expenditure of greater sums to increase the already alarmingly large deficit, but believed these other questions of increase could be properly deferred to more auspicious times. I take the position that the proposition involving $2,000,000 of expense under these conditions ought not to be adopted, and say to you, gentlemen, upon whom the responsibility for the action of this House rests, in behalf of this postal service, to take heed lest these expenditures will far overreach the postal receipts. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], a member of the postal committee, as I suppose the other members of the Committee of the Whole are, and I would suggest to him that if curtailment is necessary it would be a good idea now, and it would have been a good idea a long time ago, to have commenced with the railroads. It seems to be admitted that for a long time it has been possible for the railroads to obtain compensation on the theory that six times seven are forty-nine. Now, we have just cured that mathematical error here this afternoon, and we are about to vote on a proposition involving a question of doing justice to a class of men who have long had injustice done them by this body and by this Government. In our travels we have all met with the railway mail clerks; and I want to call the attention of the committee to an incident which came to my attention in traveling through my own district. The end of the New York and Greenwood Lake Railroad is at a summer resort known as "Greenwood Lake." The railway mail clerk who had that run ran from Jersey City to Greenwood Lake; had a run which ends there at night. He was compelled to stop there overnight, there being no train out. He was compelled to keep a residence in Jersey City, residing there with his mother. At the end of his run he has had to go to the hotel, pay for his supper, pay for his lodging, and pay for his breakfast the next morning. That man has been supposed to do that on a salary of $800 a year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Yes, sir.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman to say that the salary of a railway mail clerk was $800 a year.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. At the time I was speaking of.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no railway mail clerk who has been accepted into the service who receives the minimum salary of $800 a year.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. How long has that been so?

Mr. STAFFORD. That has been so for a long time, except as to men during their probationary period, while serving as substitutes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. This man was very probably a probationary mail clerk.

Mr. STAFFORD. After being admitted into the service a man is paid at the rate of $900 for the first three months, and after that at the rate of a thousand dollars a year.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. The gentleman has said nothing inconsistent with what I state.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman gave the impression that railway mail clerks receive as low a salary as $800 a year. Their average compensation is $1,200.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I said this man was getting $800, and I still say so. It is evident that an injustice was being done in that case. Now, it has been said that Congress, as a general proposition, is generous to people in high places. It has been said a dozen times here this afternoon that Congress has been extremely generous to the railroads. What the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has said is admitted on all hands—that these men occupy a hazardous position; that they do grand work; that they are a splendid body of men. They have no time to come here, either themselves or through their representatives, to lobby propositions through this House or through this committee, but the inherent justice of their claim is an appeal to every Member of this House. I submit that it is no more than right and no more than fair that these men should be equalized. One man may have a route or a run that sends him out in the morning and home again at night. He receives fully as much salary as another man who may be sent out 50 or 60 miles and be compelled to stay overnight. It is no more than fair that the expenses of the second man should be paid, and he be placed in a position of equality with the other.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think anyone who is acquainted with legislation in the interest of railway mail clerks will doubt in the least my friendship and interest in this large and most deserving class of public servants. My record in Congress and in the Post-Office Committee of the House prove conclusively my concern for the railway mail clerks; but, Mr. Chairman, an amendment is proposed here that can do no possible good to the railway mail clerks. It is proposed to increase the item here of $20,000 to $2,020,000. I say to the Members of this House that not one cent of this $2,000,000, even if it is voted, can possibly, under existing law, be paid to the railway mail clerks for expenses on the ordinary run and travel—not one cent. Now, I want to ask, what is the necessity for increasing a $20,000 item to $2,020,000 when it can do no possible good? It will not amount to one single cent of benefit to any railway mail clerk in the United States—not a cent.

Mr. GOEBEL. Does not the gentleman know that railway mail clerks are carried in this item, and that the reason there was no compensation paid them was because there was an insufficient appropriation?

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will excuse me, I will say that the gentleman from Ohio is aware of the fact that under existing law, as construed by the Department and passed upon by the courts, the railway mail clerks are not entitled, under the law, to travel expense allowance when on their runs.

Mr. GOEBEL. Where is the decision of the court that has construed this item?

Mr. FINLEY. My understanding is that one of the mail clerks brought a suit in the Court of Claims.

Mr. GOEBEL. Where was it; in what case?

Mr. FINLEY. I invite the gentleman's attention to the decisions of that court.

Mr. GOEBEL. The gentleman has made the statement, now he ought to cite us the case.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the statement and I stand by it.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. FINLEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman says that the additional $2,000,000 could not do anyone any possible good. Can it do anyone any possible harm?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say that I am in favor of doing what is right, and for the benefit of the railway mail clerk. Let us change the law. Let us increase the salary, as was done last year, and done on my initiative. That is what I am in favor of. It is idle to increase this appropriation. No; it will not do any harm, but it will be a $2,000,000 unexpended appropriation at the end of the fiscal year. Why not amend the law and increase the salary of the railway mail clerks? Go about it in a straightforward and open way.

Mr. MURDOCK. I will be in favor of that, but here is an item here, and we can place in the hands of the Department $2,000,000. I want to say to the gentleman that this is only one-half of the legislative body—the Senate has to pass upon this before it becomes final legislation.

Mr. FINLEY. This will not place any money in the hands of the Department which can be used for the benefit of the railway mail clerks. I do not think the gentleman intended to make the broad statement, because he is mistaken. There is no doubt about the law, so that the proposed increase here is utterly idle.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and the amendment thereto close in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendment thereto be closed in three minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, a proper construction of this amendment is to be found in the language, "away from the several designated headquarters." It has been held that all of the officials named in this paragraph may have their expenses paid when they are away from designated headquarters. Now, in the case of railway postal clerks, it is held that where they are away from designated headquarters means like where they were in attendance on trials in court. It has never been construed to mean when engaged in the regular routine work of the employees.

Mr. GOEBEL. Assuming that the gentleman is right, then was not there a failure to pay by reason of want of appropriation?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not at all. The appropriation was to cover the expenses of the amount designated in this appropriation when they were away from their designated headquarters. The fact that there has never been a deficiency in this item since its origin, that there has always been, however small, some unexpended balance remaining, is evidence that they have not waited for a greater appropriation to meet expenses of the railway mail clerks while in the discharge of ordinary duties.

These clerks have to have a great deal of ability. I concede that. I am not underestimating their standing or their skill, but they are better paid in proportion to the character of their duties than any other one branch of the postal employees. We insure their lives to the extent of $1,000. We pay their regular salary when they are injured for a period of one year, and then in this item only the expenses when away from their designated headquarters are allowed. The addition of $2,000,000 would be of no more force than if you made it $40,000,000, because none of it could be used except for the same character of expense for which it thus far has been used, in the disbursement of that item of appropriation.

Mr. GOEBEL. That is the gentleman's construction.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Well, I have a little law to depend upon in addition to the Department's construction. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOEBEL) there were—ayes 13, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation of mail by electric and cable cars, $725,000: Provided, That the rate of compensation to be paid per mile shall not exceed the rate now paid to companies performing such service, except that the Postmaster-General, in cases where the quantity of mail is large and the number of exchange points numerous, may, in his discretion, authorize payment for closed-pouch service at a rate per mile not to exceed one-third above the rate per mile now paid for closed-pouch service; and for mail cars and apartments carrying the mails, not to exceed the rate of 1 cent per linear foot per car mile of travel: Provided, further, That the rates for electric-car service on routes over 20 miles in length outside of cities shall not exceed the rates paid for service on steam railroads: Provided, however, That not to exceed $30,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order as against the last proviso. What are the particular conditions under which the Postmaster-General is expected to expend not exceeding $30,000 of this appropriation?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, it was brought to the attention of this committee that there were a number of instances where, by reason of the general character of the service, the service could be performed really more cheaply by electric and cable car, although at a higher rate than the law allowed. For example, there was one case in New Jersey where there was an electric-car service going across country, and the company controlling it absolutely refused to carry the mail under the limitations of the law per linear foot, as provided by law. Therefore the mail is obliged to be carried partly by star route and partly by steam road, taking a much longer time than if the mail was carried across country on the electric car, and yet a contract can be entered into whereby the mail can be carried by the electric car even at a higher rate than the law prescribes, but really much more cheaply than by the other combined methods, and certainly to much greater benefit of the service.

Another instance was one brought to our attention from a point in Missouri. In that case there was an electric car line between two communities, I think but a few miles separated, and yet that car line refused to contract at the regular rates prescribed by statute, and the only way for the mail transportation between the two points was by star service. The contract for the star service was much higher than the electric road was quite willing to carry the mails for and at a much better advantage to the Government, although it would have been at a slightly increased price over the provisions of the current law.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The case he speaks of, of Carrollton, Mo., I am quite familiar with. In that case is it not true that under existing law the highest rate that could be paid to the electric-car line was about $300, while as a matter of fact the Government has been forced to pay $750, because the electric car can not carry it at the price that could be paid.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The committee thought by the limited amount authorized, $30,000, where it could be used as the language of the provision states at less expense than the other service, even though at a little higher rate than the law authorizes, for the cable car and electric service, it was wise legislation.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I submitted the inquiry to the Second Assistant Postmaster-General as to the object of this proviso, and he gave an entirely different explanation from that given by my friend, the chairman of the committee. As I understand the position, it is this: This proposition is to pay every electric railway company that refuses to accept the rates provided by law such additional pay as it is willing to accept, providing it is less than the cost of the star service. Now, it seems to me that payment for electric-car service should be based upon some general legal provision, and not merely upon the desire of an electric railway company to get the service at a rate of pay to be fixed by itself. Nearly every new company is very anxious to get the contract, and the service is installed. The star contractor is put out of business. There is practically no longer any competition from star service, and then the electric railway company comes in with a new proposition above the rates allowed by law and is willing to continue carrying the mails if its judgment of the value of the service, viz, all it will stand, is accepted by the Post-Office Department and the compensation rated accordingly.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I understood the gentleman to say that he interrogated the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and that he gave the gentleman from Pennsylvania an entirely different reason from what I have stated. I will say that the subcommittee in the preparation of the bill had before it Mr. Stewart, of the Second Assistant's office, and these are the reasons given by Mr. Stewart. Will the gentleman explain what the Second Assistant Postmaster-General said to him?

Mr. WANGER. Yes; with pleasure. The Second Assistant said the reason this appropriation was desired was that in some few instances the cost of delivery to post-offices within the 80-rod limit amounted almost to the total of compensation and deprived the electric railway company of reasonable compensation for carrying the mails.

Now, until we find in some way what the purpose of this appropriation is and the method of its expenditure, I feel it my duty to make the point of order, and I believe my friend will concede it is subject to it. I will withhold the point of order, however, for the present. If a proposition can be submitted to provide for the application of this money so that we understand what basis it is to be upon, and can approve of that basis, why, of course, I have no objection to its being made.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I will submit a case. The city of Millville and the city of Bridgeton, in my district, lie less than 12 miles apart. The distance from Bridgeton down to Port Morris, passing on the way a third-class post-office of advanced grade, is 12 miles. The trolley carried the mails until a couple of years ago, more or less, when they refused to longer carry them for the rates of pay allowed steam railroads. The mail was taken off very readily, some gentleman believing, like our friend, perhaps, that it was only a strike of the company to get higher pay, and that they would take the mail back again. Two years, more or less, have gone by and they are still refusing to carry that mail. Now, the result is that the mails from Bridgeton to Millville, less than 12 miles distant, go from Bridgeton to Glassboro by rail and from Glassboro back to Millville by rail.

The mail to get from Bridgeton to Dividing Creek and Port Morris, covering a 24-mile route, goes by star route, and gets down to-day and may be answered to-morrow, whereas the trolley would deliver it very frequently. The result is that the people of important communities, not counting the small offices en route, are reduced to a daily mail, and this after once having been accustomed to frequent mail carried by trolley. So the mail facilities of a large section of the county—many thousands of people—have been greatly reduced. Port Morris, the oyster port, where more than 700 vessels harbor and trade, and the crews of those more than 700 vessels receive their mail there in season. It comes by star route or must be carried over Morris River. They had been accustomed to a splendid service by trolley.

Now, what about the cost? I interrogated the Department, like our friend, and they assure me that the cost of the present service, by star route, is very much greater than the price asked by the trolley company to resume carrying it.

And they did not take into that computation the cost of carrying the mail between Millville and Bridgeton, a roundabout way of 80 miles, more or less, of steam road. Putting the two together, the cost is doubtless trebled for the privilege of reducing the mail facilities of these important communities from a frequent to a daily service. That is a situation that this provision was specifically designed to meet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER] have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I want to call specific attention to the fact that the information which the gentleman got at the Department must have been misinformation, or else the cases are so few that there ought to be no hesitation in meeting them, because the entire appropriation to meet these exigencies provided in this bill is the sum of $30,000. It reads:

Provided, however, That not to exceed $30,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise.

Why anyone should desire to interpose a point of order against a provision that could not exceed $30,000 of expenditure and requires that the conditions must be unusual, that the service shall be more expeditious and more efficient, and at no greater cost I do not understand. If that is not good legislation, I would like my friend to point out what would be.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, the case cited by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER], I think, enforces my proposition that we should stand by the principle that the rate of compensation to electric railways for carrying the mail should be fixed by law upon equitable principles; and I think this Congress should go further and declare all steam and electric railways in the country post-roads, and force the carriage of mails whether the companies desire the service or not, and where they insist that the compensation is confiscatory, permit them to go into court to have it judicially determined what is a fair rate of compensation. In that way Congress will have light upon the subject. Take the case cited by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER], which strongly appeals to me because of my fondness for oysters, and from the fact that the oyster supply is involved in the service in this case, suppose this company is granted this additional compensation, why is it done? Not because there is unusual expense to deliver mails to post-offices, but simply because the company is unwilling to accept the compensation which other companies receive and which the law specifies as the minimum. What else will this $30,000 do but pleasantly gratify the appetite of a very few companies and whet the appetites of many other electric railways now doing the service, so that the latter will refuse to accept the compensation which is now given and demand higher compensation therefor. Therefore I make the point of order against this proviso.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. OLMSTED.) Will the gentleman state his point or order?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will withhold his point of order for a moment, I will state that my recollection is, Mr. Chairman, and I call it to the distinguished gentleman's attention, that there is no law on the statute books which gives the Postmaster-General power to compel a railroad to haul the mail.

Mr. WANGER. I want a law put on the statute books.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Postmaster-General Wilson, Postmaster-General Bissell, or Postmaster-General Wanamaker, one or other of these very great officers, called on Congress to give him the power to compel the railroads to take the mails, and yet we have never done it. The truth of the matter is that when the time comes to act the railroads are found to have been "running the country" in this matter. One or the other of these great officers said that he had no power to make the railroads haul the mail. In that connection, when this officer was appealed to to act, he said it was for Congress to give him power to compel. I say this is a calamitous condition, a horrible condition, Mr. Chairman, that this great officer here, Postmaster-General Meyer, I think a very competent officer, and his predecessors have not had the power to make the railroads haul the mail, and then let Congress and the courts settle the question as to whether or not the rate agreed on is a just and reasonable compensation. Let this power be given, but let us also pay a just rate; then no one is hurt.

Mr. WANGER. I agree with the gentleman that authority ought to be conferred.

Mr. RUCKER. I ask the gentleman to withhold his point of order for a moment. I want to say that when the time comes and the gentleman has perfected and secured the enactment into law of the ideal conditions he has just described, there would then probably be no need of legislation such as sought by this proviso. But let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the United States is spending millions—over a hundred million dollars annually—to give the people of the country proper mail facilities. In the community in which I live is a large town—one of the largest cities in my district—situated practically upon three railroads, the depots being separated by something like from half to three-quarters of a mile. At present the citizens of this town have to depend upon wagon service and star-route service to get the mails from the depots to the post-office. I say to the gentleman that much better and more efficient service can be had if the electric-car line there is permitted to compete for carrying the mail. Under existing law the total amount which the electric road can be paid for carrying the mail from the three stations to the city post-office, as I recollect it, is about $250 or $300, and yet every year the Government has been and is paying individuals about $750 for much poorer service, much less efficient service. All that I am asking, and I think all that is contemplated in this proviso, is that the people of Carrollton, Mo., and of other cities similarly situated, shall have the best service at the lowest price. I say to the gentleman that the electric railway at the city of Carrollton in Missouri would, in my opinion, gladly accept the contract for carrying the mail at $500 a year, and no mortal man can perform the service and earn living wages at a price less than $750. He can not do it, because he has to cross a creek and some lowlands, and sometimes encounters snowdrifts, storms, and high water, while the electric railway, operated on a good track, runs quickly and regularly to the stations and meets all trains carrying mail. I sincerely hope, in view of the fact that this proviso only authorizes a small appropriation—and let me say, by way of parentheses, there are only three or four places in the United States to which this particular provision would apply, one in New Jersey and one in my district——

Mr. WANGER. Two in my district.

Mr. RUCKER. Well, if it should apply to two cities in the gentleman's district, it would give the people better mail service and at a lower cost than is now secured. I therefore invoke and urge the gentleman, if he will, to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WANGER. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will please state his point of order.

Mr. WANGER. The point of order is to the proviso beginning on line 11, page 22, which is new legislation and changes existing law. The rates of compensation by existing law are fixed. The only purpose of this proviso, as stated by the chairman of the committee, is to authorize the Postmaster-General to pay an additional sum in excess of what is provided by law, and therefore to that extent it changes the law.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I would like to make a suggestion on the point of order. The rate of pay is fixed, as the gentleman suggests, for the carrying of mail by railroads. This bill does not mean to provide for all railroad service in the ordinary sense of the term, or within the meaning of the law, that has fixed the rate for compensation to railroads for carrying the mail.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman whether there is any law authorizing the service for which this $30,000 is provided.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I will put the question to the Chair in this form, in order to convey my meaning: Is there a law preventing it? There is a law authorizing the Department to contract for special-messenger service, or for star-route service, between Millville and Bridgeton. The law does authorize them to contract for special-messenger service, which would be expensive, or other service between Bridgeton and the post-offices named. The question is: Does that exclude a contract with a trolley company to become such messenger? I hold that it does not. But the trolley company will not become such special messenger at the rate of pay that is authorized to the railroads, and the Second Assistant Postmaster-General is in doubt about it.

Mr. WANGER. I should like to ask the gentleman whether the law does not limit the amount of payment to be made for transportation upon electric railways, specifically declaring that no more than so much shall be paid?

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Within limited distances. What are they?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair will indulge me, I wish to take the position that the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania can not be sustained, for the reason that in the other provisos in this paragraph there is distinct and substantive legislation other than that contained in existing law. The rates of pay, as stated in these various paragraphs, are the rates carried by the appropriation law and not by the statute, as found in Postal Laws and Regulations, in which there is a compilation of the statutes, on pages 548 to 550. As there are in this paragraph items that change existing law, under the rulings of the House it must be held that any item that is germane, even though it changes existing law, will be in order.

To make the statement more definite, under existing law, as provided by permanent law, the rate of compensation for carriage on electric-car lines is three-fourths of a cent per linear foot, while in this bill, and in former appropriation bills, the rate is and has been 1 cent per linear foot. That is distinct legislation. Therefore, the point of order being raised only to the last proviso and not to the preceding proviso, and it being germane, naturally the point of order must fail.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he concedes that standing by itself this would be out of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think standing by itself it would be clearly out of order; but there being these other provisions in the paragraph which change existing law, the remainder of the paragraph would also be out of order, but no point of order has been made against the other portions of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. This does not seem to the Chair to stand on the same basis as an amendment, which, though it might by itself be out of order, yet might be offered to a paragraph in the bill which would have been subject to a point of order if the amendment were germane to such paragraph. This paragraph contains other parts which are pointed out as being subject to a point of order, but against which no point of order has been made. Now, the point of order being made against this proviso in the paragraph, the mere fact that a point of order is not made against the remainder of the paragraph does not, in the opinion of the Chair, make this paragraph in order.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the rule to be that it makes no difference whether an amendment is presented by the committee in the printed bill or whether it is offered on the floor of the House, provided the preceding paragraph was subject to a point of order and no point of order was made upon it; that in that case the proviso necessarily would be free from the point of order if it were presented.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that this proviso at any rate introduces a new change of existing law, a new substantive proposition, even if it were offered as an amendment; but being in the bill originally, and the point of order being made against it, the Chair feels that the point of order must be sustained.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER. I understand the Chair sustains the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move, in line 11, page 22, to amend by adding, after the word "railroads," the words:

And that not to exceed $30,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise.

Mr. WANGER. I make a point of order against that.

Mr. RUCKER. This is an amendment proposed to a section which of itself was subject to a point of order, and as I caught the ruling of the Chair, that makes this amendment immune.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the proviso at the end of which this amendment is offered would itself have been subject to a point of order had the point been made. It has been allowed to remain by unanimous consent, and it might be perfected by any germane amendment, but this amendment is not upon the same subject and is not intended to perfect the preceding paragraph.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. One moment, Mr. Chairman. The new legislation found in this paragraph is only the legislation that relates to the linear foot for service of electric cars:

That the rate for electric-car service on routes over 20 miles in length outside of cities shall not exceed the rate paid for service on steam railroads.

And the proviso is limited to a provision—a limitation or exception—that where unusual conditions exist, where the service will be more expeditious and efficient at no greater cost, $30,000 may be expended outside of the provisions of the preceding proviso just read. It is so germane, Mr. Chairman, that they would naturally be drawn in just that order, and, in fact, that needs no argument, for we have the illustration that they were drawn in that order and are correlated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this amendment contains a new substantive proposition, offers new legislation, and is within the rulings heretofore frequently made as changing existing law. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting, after the word "railroad," in line 11, the following as a new paragraph:

After line 11, page 22, add the following:
"To cover cost of service in inland transportation of mail by electric and cable cars, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise, $30,000.

Mr. WANGER. I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania make the point of order or reserve it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests that, in line 9, page 22, we strike out the word "twenty" and insert the word "twenty-five," and then let the remaining language stand as printed in the bill. I am quite willing to accept that arrangement.

Mr. WANGER. It will be agreeable to me if the House will accept it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The proposition is this, Mr. Chairman: The gentleman from Pennsylvania will withdraw the point of order against the proviso from line 11 to line 16 as printed in the bill and agree to an amendment in line 9 by striking out the word "twenty" and making it "twenty-five."

Mr. WANGER. I will move to amend by striking out in line 9 the word "twenty" and inserting the word "twenty-five," and in line 11, after the word "railroad," insert as follows:

Provided, however, That not to exceed $30,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise.

Mr. FINLEY. On that I reserve a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve a point of order to that amendment. I would like to ask my friend from Pennsylvania whether his objection to the provision in the bill is that under the limitation of 20 miles it does not apply to cases which he thinks ought to be covered in his district. [Laughter.]

Mr. WANGER. That is one objection, I am frank to suggest.

Mr. MANN. Then I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. WANGER. That is the practical objection, and the other is theoretical.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana will be withdrawn. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 9, strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five," and in line 11, after "railroads," insert the matter printed in the bill which reads:
"Provided, however, That not to exceed $30,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be expended, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, where unusual conditions exist or where such service will be more expeditious and efficient and at no greater cost than otherwise."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For transportation of foreign mails, $3,508,862: Provided, That the Postmaster-General shall be authorized to expend such sums as may be necessary, not exceeding $130,000, to cover one-half of the cost of transportation, compensation, and expenses of clerks to be employed in assorting and pouching mails in transit on steamships between the United States and other postal administrations in the International Postal Union, and not exceeding $40,000 for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships in New York Bay to the steamship and railway piers, and for transferring the foreign mail from incoming steamships in San Francisco Bay to the piers.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, amend by adding at the end of line 4 these words:
"Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used to pay for the carrying in the mails any malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors, or intoxicating liquors of any kind, or cocaine or derivative thereof."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I wish to inquire if this is the same amendment that has heretofore been adopted.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; it is identical with the others.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment—nor that any patent medicines or other compounds that contain more than 3 per cent alcohol shall be carried.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the amendment:
"Nor any patent medicines or compounds containing more than 3 per cent alcohol."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that he add to the amendment a provision for the appointment of one expert chemist in every post-office in the United States. There is no other way of carrying out his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. KÜSTERMANN) there were—ayes 16, noes 45.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For travel and miscellaneous expenses in the postal service, office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, $1,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, before we pass from the subject of the transportation of mail, I ask the chairman of the committee to recur to page 16 for the purpose of offering an amendment that I forgot, inadvertently, to offer at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to return to page 16 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be first reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "served," in line 6, page 16, insert the word "entirely;" after the word "already," in line 9, page 16, insert the word "entirely."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is the effect of this amendment?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I will explain it in a very few words. This action relates to star routes, and it provides as follows:

That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for continuance of any star-route service the patronage of which shall be served by the extension of rural-delivery service, nor shall any of said sum be expended for the establishment of new star-route service for a patronage which is already served by rural-delivery service.

I want to insert the word "entirely," and that will make it conform to the law as it now is. This bill omits the word "entirely." It should be inserted after the word "served," in the third line of the above paragraph, and also after the word "already," in sixth line. I will explain the necessity for it. Take it on the frontier, where there are sparsely settled communities, and they only have rural routes at some distances apart, and in some cases there is service only three times a week, and it is necessary to supplement one service with the other.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question as to just what he means by "entirely."

Mr. STEENERSON. It liberalizes the provision. The amendment makes the law as it is now. This is the law as it was last year.

Mr. DRISCOLL. The rural carrier goes up and down the main roads through the country, and does not travel on the crossroads. Therefore the people living on the crossroads must come to the four corners and get their mail. Does the gentleman mean by his amendment that these crossroads must be served, in order that the territory may be entirely served by the rural carrier?

Mr. STEENERSON. It simply authorizes the service where one can supplement the other in some cases. The Postmaster-General does sometimes allow a star route where the rural service is insufficient, and this would leave it entirely the way it is, if there was any service at all. I hope, in the interest of the frontier and sparsely settled communities, that this matter will be left as it is in the present law—in the discretion of the Postmaster-General.

I have in mind a case in my district that affords a good illustration of the principle. Red Lake Falls is a town that has two lines of railway, and the morning mail arrives about 10 or 11 o'clock—too late to be taken by the rural carrier. From this town is a rural route to a post-office called Terrebonne, some 10 miles easterly. It goes out one way and back another, leaving a strip 2 or 3 miles wide between. Directly from Red Lake Falls to Terrebonne, through the center of this strip, is a daily star route, with boxes for patrons. This star route leaves after the mail comes in in the morning and returns the same day. It was proposed to discontinue this star route because Terrebonne was already served by rural route, but I contended that it was not within the meaning of the law "entirely" served, and the star-route service is still maintained.

Now, if we change the law, as the bill before us proposes to do, by leaving out the word "entirely," this service will be discontinued as unauthorized. And this is only one of many cases in the sparsely settled sections where it is necessary to supplement one service with the other, and where this is done it is generally done for much less expense than rural service alone costs. In the thickly settled sections of the country, where there is country service that reaches every farmer's house, this question can not arise, for each one is entirely served; but in the more sparsely settled regions where you can not reach every farmhouse by rural carrier, it is sometimes necessary to plan and lay out a combination of rural and star routes. In such cases there may be a mile or two from the starting point or supply office traversed by both, but the greater part of the two routes would be over different roads and would reach different patrons. In such a case the Department should have the power to establish the service.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of agent and assistants to examine and distribute stamped and official envelopes and newspaper wrappers, and expenses of agency at Dayton, Ohio, including expenses attendant on inspection of manufacture of official envelopes at Cincinnati, Ohio, $25,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I notice there is considerable change in the language of this paragraph from that in the current law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman refers to the paragraph at the bottom of page 23?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That simply is occasioned by this condition, Mr. Chairman. Until very recently the contract for the manufacture of official envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and also for stamped envelopes and registry envelopes as well, was in one city, namely, Hartford, Conn. Under new contracts which have been made there are three different places where the contracts are now in force. The registry envelope manufactory contract is still in Hartford, Conn. The official envelopes are now under contract in Cincinnati, Ohio, and the stamped envelopes at Dayton, Ohio. The agency expense provided for here at Dayton, Ohio, the committee believes, will be sufficient to enable the agency at Dayton to supervise the contract for the manufacture of the official envelopes at Cincinnati as well. So that instead of duplicating agencies at Dayton and Cincinnati, which are less than 100 miles apart, and duplicating the expense, we have in this one paragraph provided by the appropriation of $25,000 to cover the expense of the agency at Dayton and the supervision by that agency of the manufacture of official envelopes in Cincinnati.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of limited indemnity for the loss of pieces of first-class domestic registered matter, $25,000. That hereafter all moneys recovered or collected on account of loss of first-class domestic registered matter which in the course of adjustment are not restored to the original owners shall be deposited to the credit and for the purposes of said indemnity fund.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that portion of the paragraph commencing on line 8, "That hereafter all moneys, etc." to the end of the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] to the fact that I did not make the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I give the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] credit for not making the point of order, and I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provision creates a permanent, indefinite appropriation, and the less there is of them the better the service.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not question the fact that it is subject to a point of order, and if the gentleman is going to insist upon it I will not take the time to try to persuade him that it is wise legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand the purpose of it; but I doubt if any explanation will make me withdraw the point of order. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] that this creates a class of appropriations which the Committee on Appropriations is attempting to prevent and to repeal where they exist.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the reason of the gentleman's objection, it is directed to that provision that creates a special fund to be set apart for this designated purpose. I understand that he has no objection to the principle that we seek to embody in this provision so as to pay all losers of registered packages the amount of a limited indemnity as soon as that liability can be acertained, rather than defer it until the post-office officials can recover the loss from the post-office clerk or other person who is guilty of the appropriation. So I ask whether the gentleman would have any objection to a provision like this: Strike out in lines 11 and 12 the words "to the credit and for the purposes of said indemnity fund," and insert in lieu thereof "in the Treasury of the United States," so as to read:

That hereafter all moneys recovered or collected on account of loss of first-class registered matter, which in the course of adjustment are not restored to the original owners, shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman that that is entirely unnecessary. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General testified before the Committee on Appropriations at this session that these amounts recovered are paid into the Treasury to the credit of the general fund, as a part of the miscellaneous receipts of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota who made that statement?

Mr. TAWNEY. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. STAFFORD. An officer of the Post-Office Department said before our committee that this indemnity that is paid to the person who loses registered packages was held back and not delivered over to the persons entitled to it until they had recovered the money from the persons liable for that depredation; and that in order to expedite the turning over of this fund it would be advisable to increase the appropriation and not hold back the allowance of money until it was obtained from the person who committed the depredation.

Mr. TAWNEY. And you have increased the amount from $5,000 to $25,000, and I think that is right. I do not believe that when the liability of the Government, or the actual damage by reason of the loss, has been ascertained, the party should be compelled to wait until the person who is responsible for that loss has made it good by repayment. For that reason you have increased the appropriation from $5,000 to $25,000 to enable the Department to make these payments just as soon as the fact of the loss has been established and the amount of the loss ascertained.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman point out the section of the law which would authorize the transfer of this money into the Treasury?

Mr. TAWNEY. When before the Committee on Appropriations on the urgent deficiency bill, Mr. Lawshe was asked this question:

Q. When the indemnity is paid under your present system and the amount is collected, is that turned into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts?—A. Yes.

Now, here is my suggestion; and he then goes on and advocates before the committee an increase of this appropriation to enable them to pay these losses without the delay incident to their collection of the amount lost from the person who was responsible for that loss.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under what authority?

Mr. TAWNEY. Under a general statute applying to all payments, whether for the sale of property or payment on account of Government service, it is turned into the Treasury unless otherwise provided and becomes a part of the general funds, as other miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not Government property.

Mr. TAWNEY. The Government is entitled to it, and they have recovered it, the same as a penalty.

Mr. STAFFORD. It belongs to a third party.

Mr. TAWNEY. The third party has been paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not justify a transfer of the property to the Government. Unless there is some substantive authority, I contend that some provision as suggested should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The point of order is insisted on, and the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Minnesota can get together and discuss the matter.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the point of order will be insisted on. Suppose there is a provision of law, as I believe, covering this question. What objection is there to putting into the post-office appropriation bill an item conforming with the law for the benefit of the post-office officials, many of whom, along with other officials of the Government, do not know such a law is on the statute books. Why not let it go into the bill?

Mr. TAWNEY. As a matter of education?

Mr. MANN. As a matter of education. It simply provides that the money shall be paid, but it brings it to the attention of the officials who have not occasion to know the general provision of the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is their duty to know the statute.

Mr. MANN. Even the gentleman from New York, who is one of the best-informed men of the House, does not know all the statutes of the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If I were conducting a bureau of the Post-Office Department I would know all the law that applied to that bureau.

Mr. MANN. This item will not hurt anything if it is put in the bill. It provides the money shall be paid into the Treasury. It gives nothing from the funds belonging to the United States or the individual.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say for the information of the gentleman from Illinois that the Department now insists that these losses, when recovered from the person who is responsible for the loss, belong to the Government if the person who has sustained the loss has been indemnified by payments out of this appropriation and the money is turned into the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman read here an examination of a post-office official, who might answer the question of the gentleman; but the gentleman is so well informed that he knows a great many answers may be made by officials, which answers are not based on facts.

Mr. STAFFORD. I submit to the gentleman from Illinois that the statement——

Mr. MANN. What would it hurt to put it into the bill and tie it where it ought to be tied? Why should any official of the Post-Office Department be penalized, as they are, unless it has been returned to the person who lost the property?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire if the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has softened any toward this item or whether he still insists on his point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I ask for a ruling.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of limited indemnity for the loss of registered articles in the international mails, $10,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve the point of order. I should like to have an explanation of this provision.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. What is the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That it is unauthorized by law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York please state what it is that he makes his point of order against?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Lines 13 and 14.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, for a number of years we have carried under the Second Assistant Postmaster-General an item of $5,000 for the payment of limited indemnity, for the loss of registered articles in the international mails. Upon request of the Postmaster-General, approved by both the Second and Third Assistant Postmasters-General, the item has been transferred to the bureau of the Third Assistant, as it appears in this bill. For a number of years, I do not know how long, not many——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has been carried before?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Oh, yes; at $5,000. It is under the treaty arrangement with other countries, under the provisions of which we are liable for the loss of registered letters.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the employment of special counsel to be appointed by the Attorney-General, when requested by the Postmaster-General, and at compensation to be fixed by the Attorney-General not exceeding this temporary appropriation, to prosecute and defend, on behalf of the Post-Office Department, all suits now pending or which may hereafter arise affecting the second-class mailing privilege, $10,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, in the year 1904 there was carried an item in the same language as this paragraph, except that the appropriation was $25,000 instead of $10,000. The money was used from year to year in the payment of attorneys and counsel fees in the defense and prosecution of cases arising out of and affecting second-class mail matter. I doubt if there has ever been appropriated an item that has been more economically and effectively expended than that item. From year to year the unexpended balance was reappropriated, until the present year, when it was all exhausted. There are yet a number of cases pending, and the aid of at least one attorney is needed in the office of the Third Assistant with reference to the prosecution of cases relating to second-class mail matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is this language identical with the original?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Identical with the original, except that the original item carried $25,000 and this carries $10,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not in the appropriation act for the current year.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The appropriation for the current year was different from this, because it merely appropriated any unexpended balance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman indulge me just a moment?

Mr. OVERSTREET. For what purpose?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a minute is all I want.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will withhold the motion for just a minute.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I said a little while ago that this "express trust" contract with the Government was "forty years old." Now I read from one of the official documents from the Appropriation Committee of last session—1908—Mr. Daskam, connected with the Department, in speaking about this contract, said:

It is quite a long contract and considered a very good one. It has been in existence for forty years. It commenced with the Adams and the United States express companies, got in here through the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Then we advertised, and there were only two bids—from the United States and Adams express companies, and they were practically the same, so we did not change the contract.

Why practically the same? Because they are "practically" one and the "same," members of this "express trust," as John Moody, in his books, says they are.

The rates are just the same as they were forty years ago, and yet they are carrying, I dare say, tenfold more money for the Government of the United States than they were at the time the contract was made forty years ago. I say this is a reform that Congress ought to start at once; an evil that ought to be eliminated.

The last report of the Register of the Treasury, fiscal year 1907, shows that bonds are and can be sent by registered mail.

PACKAGES RECEIVED AND SENT.

During the year there were received by registered mail 2,498 packages containing bonds amounting to $26,378,651.47. There were sent from the office by registered mail 4,435 packages containing bonds of the aggregate value of $53,916,429.97.

During the year the Panama Canal loan ($30,000,000) was issued, and the transfers, etc., consequent upon that issue have since been regularly made, becoming a portion of the current work of the division. An additional issue of $1,000,000 in bonds of the city of Manila was made, and this was also added to and became regularly part of the current work. The work of refunding at various times, and the redeeming of the 4 per cent funded loan of 1907, were also added to the current work.

Why not extend this kind of service, and thus create a competitor for this "express trust" and save money to the public Treasury and the taxpayer?

The Treasurer in this same report says:

SHIPMENTS OF CURRENCY FROM WASHINGTON.

The business demands of the country and the growth in the volume of paper currency adds yearly to the work of this office. The increased labor and responsibility of the Treasury in Washington is illustrated by a comparative statement of the number and value of packages of currency shipped for the past two years.

The details follow:

	Fiscal year 1906.		Fiscal year 1907.
	Number of packages.	Amount.	Number of packages.	Amount.
Total by express	68,787	$509,779,678	72,663	$570,552,811
Total by registered mail	15,390	978,197	17,320	1,214,026
Aggregate	84,177	510,757,875	89,983	571,776,867

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18347, the post-office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INVESTIGATION AS TO SUBMARINE BOATS.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee appointed pursuant to House resolution 288 is authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary in the transaction of its business, and that all expenses necessary in securing the attendance of witnesses and in carrying on the investigation be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon vouchers approved by the said committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the the same:

H. R. 14043. An act to provide for the extension of time within which homestead entrymen may establish their residence upon certain lands within the limits of the Huntley irrigation project, in the county of Yellowstone, in the State of Montana;

H. R. 16746. An act to authorize T. H. Friel or assigns to construct a dam across Mulberry Fork of the Black Warrior River;

H. R. 2915. An act for the relief of John P. Hunter;

H. R. 16749. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania by the Liberty Bridge Company, approved March 2, 1907;

H. R. 16073. An act to authorize the town of Edgecomb, Lincoln County, Me., to maintain a bridge across tide waters; and

H. R. 12803. An act allowing Chandler Bassett to perfect final proof in his homestead entry.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2948. An act to provide additional station grounds and terminal facilities for the Arizona and California Railway Company in the Colorado River Indian Reservation, Ariz.; and

S. 1931. An act to grant certain land, part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Valentine for a site for a reservoir or tank to hold water to supply the public of said village.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Attorney-General submitting an estimate of appropriation for the Reform School, District of Columbia—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for carrying into effect certain schemes of timber operations—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for public printing and binding for the Department of the Interior—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Acting Chief of Engineers, report of examination of the Tennessee River from the head of Elk River Shoals to the Florence Railway bridge, in Alabama, and on plans of improvement—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. FOSS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6289) to amend a certain provision of the act making appropriation for the naval service, approved June 29, 1906, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1222), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 19089) to encourage private salmon hatcheries in Alaska, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1223), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FOSS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17527) to equalize and fix the pay of the Navy and the Marine Corps, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1224), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17301) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to lease allotted or unallotted Indian lands for mining purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1225), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

INTERSTATE-COMMERCE REGULATIONS.

Mr. FULTON submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 423) to amend section 6 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," and is hereby instructed to report said bill to the Senate.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I see that the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce is not present in the Senate this morning. Hence I will not ask for the present consideration of the resolution. I will ask that it may lie on the table, and I may call it up later.

I will say, in presenting the resolution, that I do not wish to be understood as reflecting on the committee or any members of it, or charging them with any disposition to smother the bill. I realize that the committee is so busily engaged with hearings on matters pertaining to other bills that it is not going to be able to take up this bill and consider it any further, and therefore I shall ask later on for the consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. FULTON subsequently said: Before the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] commences his address, I ask him to yield to me for just a moment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I see that the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce is now in the Senate Chamber. I wish to call his attention to the resolution which I offered discharging the committee from the further consideration of Senate bill 423. I take it that the Senator will not object to the resolution, and therefore it might, perhaps, be adopted without any waste of time. I am quite sure the Senator does not care to detain the bill any longer, because the committee is not considering it. I have offered the resolution as much as anything else to relieve the Senator from the embarrassment of detaining the bill in his committee.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask that the resolution be read. I was not in the Chamber when it was offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution, at the request of the Senator from West Virginia.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. ELKINS. I ask that the bill be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is not at the Secretary's desk, it being before the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. ELKINS. I thought perhaps it was at the desk.

Mr. President, I want to say in behalf of the committee that I do not think there has been any unnecessary delay, or any delay that the committee could help, in the consideration of this bill. It was promptly referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a report, which was in due season made to the committee, unfavorable to the bill introduced by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FULTON. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. ELKINS. I say the bill was promptly referred, early after its introduction by the Senator, to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission reported unfavorably on the bill.

Mr. FULTON. The Interstate Commerce Commission reported against certain features or provisions of the bill. The Senator recalls very well that I appeared before his committee and accepted the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission simply desired certain changes and then recommended the bill favorably.

But, Mr. President, I do not wish to infringe on the time of the Senator from North Carolina, who is prepared to address the Senate this morning. I will ask, if the Senator from West Virginia has no objection, that the matter may lie over until after the Senator from North Carolina has concluded his remarks.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I can not allow that disposition of it without objection, for the reason that this is the second time the Senator from Oregon has referred to delay on the part of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I want to put the committee right before the Senate. I think it is but fair to the committee that I should do so.

After the Interstate Commerce Commission reported against the bill (and I will ask that their report be read), the Senator indicated a willingness to accept the amendment proposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and made an argument in favor of his bill. I think some others appeared in favor of the bill. After that the opponents of the bill, the railroad companies, asked that they might be heard.

The bill was referred to a subcommittee and it is now in the hands of a subcommittee to consider the amendment recommended by the Interstate Commerce Commission. In order to facilitate the hearing and to expedite action on the bill, the subcommittee was empowered to have hearings separate and apart from the full committee. I do not see the chairman of that subcommittee in the Senate. The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] is the chairman of the subcommittee, and he tells me that he is doing all he can to have the hearings, that the subcommittee may be informed and report intelligently when the hearings are concluded.

Mr. President, I think it is unfair to the committee to introduce this resolution. It reflects upon the committee and it is entirely unjust. I have tried, and I think the committee have tried, and have been disposed to facilitate the hearing. The Senator said he wanted to depart for his State about the 15th, and we have tried more than in the case of any other bill before the committee to get action on it. I submit it is not fair, when the railroad companies want to be heard on the bill and bring their attorneys and experts thousands of miles to be heard, to deny them a hearing.

I will ask that the letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission, reporting against the bill, be read.

Mr. CULBERSON. I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia, in view of the notice given by the Senator from North Carolina, that he might have the communication printed in the RECORD without taking up the time by having it read.

Mr. FULTON. I was going to ask——

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to have the letter read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the letter?

Mr. CULBERSON. I object, and ask for the regular order.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. FORAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the letter?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is interposed to the reading of the letter.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to its being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FORAKER. Can not the letter be read as a part of the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. ELKINS. It is very short.

Mr. FORAKER. It is a letter I have been trying to read or have read ever since it was received in the committee, and I thought I was about to be gratified in that respect.

Mr. ELKINS. I will read it as a part of my remarks.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from North Carolina suggests that the reading of it will not interfere with him, and I therefore withdraw the objection.

Mr. FORAKER. It will take only a few minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection is withdrawn, and the Secretary will read the letter, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, January 29, 1908.

HON. STEPHEN B. ELKINS,
Chairman Committee on Interstate Commerce,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Interstate Commerce Commission has the honor to submit the following in response to your communication of 24th instant, transmitting a bill (S. 423) to amend section 6 of the act to regulate commerce, introduced by Senator FULTON December 4, 1907, and requesting the Commission to "advise the committee before its next meeting, January 31, their opinion of said bill and what action they would suggest thereon."

Whilst the views of the entire Commission can not be definitely ascertained within the time named, because of absences on official business, a majority of the Commissioners, and probably all of them, would not be disposed to favor the enactment of this measure.

To give to the protest of a single shipper the effect of preventing the advance of any rate until the reasonableness of that advance was affirmatively determined by the Commission would establish a hard and fast rule of doubtful fairness to the railroads and questionable advantage to the public. Under existing conditions, we are of the opinion that it would be unwise to adopt the arbitrary limitation which this bill proposes, whatever may be found desirable or necessary in this regard in the future.

It is further to be observed that the psasage of such a bill at this time would impose a burden upon the Commission which it ought not to be asked to undertake. If every proposed advance had to be investigated by the Commission and officially sanctioned before it could take effect, the number of cases to be considered would presumably be so great as to render their prompt disposition almost impossible. In instances of justifiable increase the necessary delay resulting from the probable volume of cases would work injustice to the carriers. Until conditions become more stable and the substantive provisions of the act are more completely observed in railway tariffs and practices we entertain the belief that a wider latitude of discretion on the part of carriers than this measure allows should be permitted.

It is also suggested that the practical effect of the proposed amendment might be to prevent voluntary reductions of rates by the carriers. If no rate could be increased without the approval of the Commission after affirmative showing by the carrier, it might happen that many reductions now voluntarily accorded would not be made.

This subject of rate advances was discussed in our recent annual report to the Congress, and that portion of the report is transmitted herewith for the information of your committee. It concludes with a recommendation relating to the matter in question, in which the entire Commission concurred, and that recommendation is now respectfully renewed.

Very respectfully, MARTIN A. KNAPP, Chairman.

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me a word, and then I will let the matter go over until a subsequent time?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FULTON. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senator from North Carolina, and therefore I will refrain from discussing the matter at this time, but later in the day, if possible, or at least at the earliest available opportunity, I shall call it up again and I shall show to the Senate that with the amendment recommended by the Commission, which I appeared before the committee and accepted, and which the subcommittee unanimously agreed to, the bill is recommended and indorsed by the Interstate Commerce Commission and has the approval of every member of that Commission.

I shall not further discuss the matter at this moment. I shall call it up later.

CERTAIN LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I desire to make, briefly, some remarks; but as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] gave notice of his intention to speak this morning, I will withhold my observations until the conclusion of his remarks.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. M. C. LATTA, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On March 10, 1908, the President approved a bill of the following number and title:

S. 3941. An act to amend section 4 of an act entitled "An act to prevent unlawful occupancy of the public lands," approved February 25, 1885.

On March 11, 1908:

S. 4351. An act for the relief of the Alaska Pacific Railway and Terminal Company; and

S. 3409. An act to extend the time of payments on certain homestead entries in Oklahoma.

On March 13:

S. 5155. An act authorizing the exchange of lands for the enlargement of maneuvering grounds.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I desire to submit the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill. In view of the proposed speech of the Senator from North Carolina, I will defer action upon it until after he concludes.

The report was submitted, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 21, 22, 23, 24, 49, 52, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 68, 69, 73, 75, 85, 94, 99, 100.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 25, 26, 29, 30, 32, 34, 36, 37, 40, 41, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 50, 67, 77, 78, 80, 82, 83, 86, 87, 89, 91, 93, 102, 104, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"The Secretary of the Interior shall take possession of all buildings on lands belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes, now or heretofore used for governmental, school, or other tribal purposes, together with the furniture therein and the land appertaining thereto, and appraise and sell the same at such time and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and deposit the proceeds, less expenses incident to the appraisement and sale, in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the tribes respectively owning the said land and improvements, and immediately after any such sale patents for the realty thus sold shall be made and delivered in the same manner as now provided by law for other tribal property: Provided, That when practicable preference right shall be given to the State, counties, and municipalities of Oklahoma to purchase said lands and improvements at the appraised value: And provided, That pending such appraisement and sale the Secretary of the Interior may temporarily lease said buildings and lands for the benefit of the tribes respectively to which they belong."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "and," strike out the words "purchase of;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and correct the total so as to read: "In all, two million one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert: "That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to send a special Indian agent, or other representative of his Office, to visit any Indian tribe for the purpose of negotiating and entering into a written agreement with such tribe for the commutation of the perpetual annuities due under treaty stipulations, to be subject to the approval of Congress; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall transmit to Congress said agreements, with such recommendations as he may deem proper;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ninety" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighty-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 strike out the word "may" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall;" in the same line strike out the words "from this" and in line 5 the word "appropriation;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment add the following: "Provided, That this appropriation shall be so expended as to make further appropriation for this purpose unnecessary;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 33, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the word "reservation," in line 10, add: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be available until the proper officer of the Indian Bureau shall investigate and report that the work contemplated can be completed for the amount herein appropriated;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 35, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the land in the following subdivisions now embraced in the Coeur d'Alene Reservation, in Idaho, to wit: Sections one, two, and twelve, township forty-six north, range four west, Boise meridian; sections thirty-five and thirty-six, township forty-seven north, range four west, Boise meridian; all of those portions of sections two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten, and eleven, township forty-six north, range three west, Boise meridian, lying south and west of the St. Joe River, in said township; all of those portions of sections thirty-one and thirty-two, township forty-seven north, range three west, Boise meridian, lying south and west of the St. Joe River, in said township, is reserved and withdrawn from allotment and settlement, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to convey any part thereof to the State of Idaho to be maintained by said State as a public park, said conveyance to be made for such consideration and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe. The proceeds of such sale shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States for the use and benefit of the Coeur d'Alene Indians in such manner as Congress shall hereafter prescribe."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "authorized," insert the words "in his discretion;" and in line 6, after the word "purchase," strike out the words "in his discretion;" in line 9, after the word "Iowa," strike out the balance of said amendment; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2, after the word "to," strike out the words "use and;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 strike out the words "and directed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in his discretion." At the end of said amendment add:

"Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, in his discretion, to pay, upon the surrender of the note hereinafter described, out of the above sum appropriated for the Sac and Fox Indians, to Helen Pennock, the widow and surviving heir of William Pennock, the sum of six hundred dollars, in full settlement of a promissory note given by Mo-ko-ho-ko and Ke-wa-quah, chiefs of the Sac and Fox Indians, and Ketch-e-Cush, a councilman."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 84, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of proposed amendment, and on page 36, in line 21, after the word "patent," strike out "and conveying;" and in line 22 strike out the word "same;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 88, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof:

"That contracts heretofore or hereafter made by and between persons stricken by the Secretary of the Interior from the final rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes, or whose right to be upon said rolls is or shall be a matter of litigation, and attorneys employed by them to secure their restoration to or their right to be upon said rolls are hereby declared valid and enforceable in the event of the restoration of said persons to the rolls or success in such litigation against allotted lands or tribal funds of the persons so restored to or given rights upon the said rolls, if such contracts are approved by the Secretary of the Interior in their original or such modified form as he may deem equitable, and not otherwise."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the Chickasaw fund, to D. H. Johnson, governor of the Chickasaw Nation, compensation for his services as such governor at the rate of fifteen hundred dollars per annum from March fourth, nineteen hundred and six, so long as he shall legally serve as such governor."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 92, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu thereof:

", and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to so disburse this appropriation as to complete said work by July first, nineteen hundred and nine."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 95, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 96, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 97, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert in lieu of the amount proposed, "$12,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 98, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert:

"That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is authorized and directed to invite proposals for the construction of a gravity water system for the Rapid City School, to be supplied from the springs located on the school farms, said bids to cover construction of suitable reservoir and laying of a 6-inch main thereon to said school buildings and grounds, and such minor and collateral piping as may seem necessary, and to report thereon to Congress."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 101, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of said amendment and insert the following:

"The Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to expend so much of the trust funds of the Ute Indians, not exceeding $75,000, now in the United States Treasury, as, in his judgment, may be necessary to prevent want and suffering among the Absentee Utes, and the amount so expended for each individual Absentee shall be made a matter of record to be charged against and deducted from the share said absentee may be entitled to receive when the trust funds of the Utes are allotted and distributed to the members of the tribe."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 103, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On line 3 of said amendment strike out "Uinta" and insert "Uintah." Transpose entire amendment to page 48 and place after amendment one hundred and one; and the Senate agree to the same.

OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the shipping bill, so called.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have given much thought and study to the proposition contained in the bill now before the Senate. It deals with an exceedingly important question, and I have earnestly sought to bring to its consideration an unbiased and untrammeled judgment.

I shall not attempt an elaborate discussion of the subject, but I shall content myself with a plain, direct statement of the purposes and effect of the bill and the practical conditions which, I think, make its enactment at this time wise and expedient.

The bill is simply a proposition to amend the ocean mail service law of 1891. It does not change the principles of that act in the slightest. The bill is very short, embracing only a few lines, and in order that I may present my argument with greater clearness, I will read it.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to pay for ocean mail service under the act of March 3, 1891, in vessels of the second class on routes to South America, to the Philippines, to Japan, to China, and to Australasia, 4,000 miles or more in length, outward voyage, at a rate per mile not exceeding the rate applicable to vessels of the first class as provided in said act.

The act of 1891 authorized the Postmaster-General to enter into contracts for terms of years, not less than five nor more than ten, with American citizens for carrying the mails between this country and the ports of foreign countries. For the purposes of that law American steamships are divided into four classes: First, steamers of 20 knots speed per hour, with a gross tonnage of not less than 8,000 tons; second, steamers of 16 knots per hour speed, with a gross tonnage of not less than 5,000 tons; third, steamers of 14 knots, with a gross tonnage of not less than 2,500 tons; and fourth, of 12 knots, with a gross tonnage of not less than 1,500 tons.

The act provides that the rate of compensation for such ocean mail service for steamers of the first class shall not exceed $4 per mile outward voyage; of the second class, $2 per mile; of the third class, $1 per mile; and of the fourth class, 66 cents per mile, by the shortest practicable route.

In order to come within the provisions of the act steamers of the first, second, and third classes are required to be constructed upon plans and specifications agreed upon by the Navy Department, with a view to prompt and economical conversion into auxiliary naval cruisers. These steamships are required also to carry a mail messenger and to provide suitable room and accommodation both for him and the mail; also one cadet or apprentice, who is to be an American boy, for each thousand gross tons capacity and for each majority fraction of a thousand gross tons.

By the terms of the law all steamers so employed may at any time be condemned by the Government and purchased for use as auxiliary cruisers or transports upon a price to be agreed upon, or in case of disagreement to be fixed by appraisement.

Finally, under the act the contract is let by advertisement, as required in the Revised Statutes, section 2941, for letting contracts for carrying inland mail.

These are the essential provisions of the act of 1891 as they are affected by the bill under consideration.

At present, Mr. President, and for many years past our foreign mail service has not only been self-sustaining but it has yielded a considerable profit. While the adoption of this bill will probably add twenty-five or twenty-seven high-class merchant ships to our almost at present insignificant merchant marine and give us prompt and reliable business communication with the Orient and the important countries to the south of us, it is practically certain that Congress will never be called upon, if this amendment is adopted, to appropriate one dollar for this new and additional service. Certainly that will be the case if the amendment I shall offer and of which I shall speak later is adopted.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, the receipts from this service, exclusive of Canada and Mexico, amounted to $6,579,043.48, while the disbursements amounted to only $2,941,816.67, leaving a profit from this service in favor of the Government in that year of $3,627,000. For the year 1906 the excess in receipts over cost in this service in round figures amounted to $3,000,000; in 1905, to $2,000,000; in 1904, to $2,500,000; in 1903, to $2,600,000; in 1902, to $1,491,000, and in 1900, to $1,452,000.

On the average for the past seven years the volume of the ocean mails has increased annually a trifle over 12 per cent, the postage for ocean mails nearly 13 per cent, the cost of ocean transportation only 6½ per cent, and the profits, subject to slight qualifications, 21 per cent.

These figures show not only a gradual, and I might add a rapid, increase in the profits of this service, but they show that the excess in receipts over cost in this branch of the postal service is not occasional but is a fixed factor in the finances of that Department, and may therefore be safely relied upon as a fund for the improvement of that service.

Early in the month of February, shortly after this bill was introduced, and I wish to ask the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire at this point, I introduced a proposed amendment to the bill in these words:

Provided, That the compensation from foreign mail service in any one year shall not exceed the estimated revenue therefrom in that year.

I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will see his way clear to accept this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I think his amendment is a very fair and proper one, and so far as I am personally concerned I will take great pleasure in accepting it and letting it become a part of the proposed bill without any controversy.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. If it does not interrupt the Senator, I would be glad to have him restate his amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. The amendment is to be inserted at the end of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Has the Senator the text of the amendment there?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have. It reads as follows:

Provided, That the compensation for foreign mail service in any one year shall not exceed the estimated revenues therefrom in that year.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, if it does not interrupt the Senator from North Carolina, I desire to ask a further question, and that is, if he is able to state the expenditures and revenues of the postal service with reference to South America, the Philippines, Japan, China, and Australasia; in other words, I should like to know how the amount of expenditures for that particular service compares with the receipts?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not been able to get the Department to segregate the expenditures and the receipts of the service so as to enable me to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. CULBERSON. The figures now presented by the Senator from North Carolina refer to the whole foreign mail service?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; they relate to the whole foreign mail service. I will state that I have asked for such a segregation, but I have not up to this date received it.

The Department estimates that it will require twenty-seven 16-knot steamers to give us adequate mail with South America and the Orient under this bill, and that the cost of that service will be about $3,630,000 per annum, or about $30,000 less than the profits on our foreign mail service for 1907. If the present rate of profit on our foreign mail service continues and the Department's estimate of the cost of this new service is correct, the receipts will be sufficient for the establishment of the routes now contemplated, and my amendment would be unnecessary.

But, Mr. President, the bill does not limit the number of lines the Department may establish, nor the number of ships it may employ, and my purpose in offering this amendment is to limit expenditures to receipts and to prevent expansion of the service faster than the receipts from it may justify. This amendment is in line with the general policy of our postal administration, by which receipts from postage are appropriated to the expenses of the postal administration. It fixes automatically a limit on expenditures by requiring that the expenses on ocean mail service can not exceed receipts, but as the business increases and the receipts increase this service may be extended and improved.

Mr. President, the bill simply amends the act of 1891 by authorizing and empowering the Postmaster-General to pay American steamships of the second class engaged in carrying our mail to South America, to the Philippines, to Japan, China, and Australia the same rate that that act allows to American vessels of the first class, and the only difference between vessels of the first and second class as defined in the act is the difference between 20 knots and 16 knots speed per hour and the difference between a tonnage capacity of 8,000 tons and 5,000 tons.

Would this amendment be to the interest of the postal service? Would it promote our foreign commerce and would it be a proper expenditure of the public money? I think, Mr. President, an analysis of the facts will show that the differentiation made by the act of 1891 between the compensation allowed steamers of first and second class is unwarranted and that in the conditions and requirements of our ocean transportation it is unjust and discriminatory against our oriental and South American postal service and trade.

There are to-day in the whole world, Mr. President—and this I regard as a very important fact in connection with the subject which I am discussing—there are to-day in the whole world but twenty-one steamships of the first class, as ships of this class are defined in the act of 1891, and every one of these steamships, except two owned by the Canadian Pacific Railroad and running between Canada and Europe, sail from New York to ports of northern Europe. Not one of them enters or clears any other port in this country except New York. The great volume of business and travel between New York and Europe, the character of that traffic, especially its high-class passenger and express business, has made these swift, luxuriously appointed steamships necessary in that trade, but they are not needed to meet the condition and requirements of trade anywhere else in the world.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SIMMONS. With pleasure.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, under the act of 1891 the Postmaster-General is authorized to pay to ships sailing 20 knots an hour or more $4 per statute mile for the outward trip. That law also requires that such ships shall be built under certain requirements of the Navy Department.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have stated that.

Mr. FOSTER. And that they must be manned by American seamen and must be available as cruisers in time of war.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. If this amendment prevails or this bill passes, giving to the 16-knot ships the same pay that the original law gave to the 20-knot ships, will it likewise require the ships to be built according to the regulations of the Navy Department, and will it likewise require them to be available for cruisers in time of war, and must they be manned by American seamen?

Mr. SIMMONS. Such ships will have to be built upon the same terms and conditions that the act of 1891 prescribes for the construction of ships of the first class to be employed in carrying the mails by the Government. This is a mere amendment of that act. The Senator was probably absent from the Chamber when I stated the general provisions of the act of 1891. I stated them to be substantially as he has stated them.

Mr. BACON. I understand the details which the Senator has recited apply to all the different classes.

Mr. SIMMONS. To all classes; yes, sir. The proposed amendment raises the compensation of steamers of the second to that fixed by the original act for steamers of the first class—that is the only change it makes as respects compensation.

The vessels of the first class, Mr. President—and it was the first class I was discussing—get $4 per mile, as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER] has just stated, and every one of these twenty-one ships which flies the American flag is now under the employment of the Post-Office Department under the act of 1891.

The conditions of the deep-sea commerce of the Pacific are entirely different from those between New York and the ports of northern Europe. The volume and character of our trade in those waters does not justify the use of vessels of the first class. In that trade a vessel of this class could not live at all. Of the eleven great steamships, whether floating our flag or that of a foreign country, running between the Pacific ports of the United States and oriental countries not one is of the first class, and only eight are of the second class, and it will probably be many years before that trade will justify the employment of ships of a higher class than those now in use.

The same is true with respect to our ocean commerce with South America. At present there is not a single ship either of the first or second class, and only three of the third class, employed in that trade. That trade does not require ships of the first class; it could not support them. Ships of 16 knots speed, with a tonnage capacity of 5,000 tons, are as fast and as large a class of boats as either our South American or Pacific business at present requires, and they are just as well adapted to that trade as ships of 20 knots speed and 8,000 tons burden are to the trade between New York and Europe. I submit, Mr. President, that under these circumstances there is no reason why steamers of the second class should not be paid as much for carrying the mails in these waters as the larger and faster steamers which sail from New York. Under the circumstances, to allow $4 per mile for carrying the mail between New York and Europe and only $2 per mile for carrying it to South America and the Orient is an injustice and a discrimination which, in the interest of the public and the business involved, ought to be removed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that, while the law of 1891 requires that second-class steamers shall not be less than 5,000 tons, two ships, I think, that were built last year for the West India trade, although second-class steamships, were of 6,000 tons, and it is exceedingly probable, indeed almost a certainty, that on the longer routes ships will be built of at least 8,000 tons, and yet they will be denominated "second-class ships."

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, they will have less than the maximum speed required for first-class ships. No doubt as the business increases ships of larger tonnage will be required, and the Senator is right in saying the capacity of these vessels will be increased, but it will be a long time before that trade will require ships of 20 knots—that is, of the first class.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; they are simply 16-knot ships, but they are larger ships than would be required under the law of 1891.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the argument I was presenting when interrupted by the Senator from New Hampshire receives additional force from the fact that a $4 per mile rate is not necessary to get our mail carried in American bottoms between New York and Europe, while it is necessary to pay a larger compensation than $2 per mile in order to get our mail carried in American bottoms to South America and to the Orient.

I do not make this statement upon my own authority, but upon the authority of statements coming from officials of the Department having control of these matters. The report of the Postmaster-General shows that on account of the immense volume of our postal business between New York and Europe the four American contract steamers sailing from New York would have received for the year 1906 $140,000 more than they did receive in that year if they had been paid under the weight-rates basis of the act of 1872 instead of the mileage basis of the act of 1891.

Bearing upon this phase of the question I have a letter from Mr. E. T. Chamberlain, Commissioner of Navigation, addressed to me and dated March 6, 1907, which contains some exceedingly interesting statements and exhibits. With the indulgence of the Senate I will read a part of this letter.

I omitted giving you yesterday the statement you asked for showing that at the $4 rate under the ocean mail contract law of 1891 the 20-knot American mail-line steamers have really received less than they would have received had they been paid under the act of 1872, sea and inland postage. The annexed table shows the details since 1900, taken from the reports of the superintendent of foreign mails. I have no reports earlier than that date. The report for 1907 was not printed, but the company was actually paid under the act of 1891 the sum of $691,224, while on sea and inland postage on mails carried it would have received $931,309.12, showing that it would have received $140,085.12 more under the act of 1872 than it did get under the contract act of 1891. For eight years the showing is as follows:

	Excess of receipts.
Excess (act 1872):
1907	$140,085.12
1906	147,904.08
1905	119,748.48
1904	61,565.28
1903	38,589.36
		$507,892.32
Excess (act 1891):
1902	26,523.36
1901	162,073.44
1900	258,325.92
Balance		60,969.60

This table shows, Mr. President, that in the beginning of its contract with the Government the company operating this line of steamers would have received under the mileage basis of the act of 1891 something over $258,000 more than under the weight-rate act of 1872, and that that condition continued for several years, but that in recent years, especially during the last three, on account of the immense volume of mail these steamers now carry, it would have received largely more under the weight-rate basis of the act of 1872 than under the mileage basis of the act of 1891. For these reasons, Mr. President, I say that the postal rate prescribed in this act is no longer necessary to secure our mails carried in American ships from New York to Europe.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what has been the result of the efforts of the owners of second-class American steamships to carry our foreign mail on the Pacific for $2 per mile. There are only seven American steamships engaged in foreign trade on the Pacific which are eligible for contract under the act of 1891; of these seven steamships only three, the Sonoma, the Ventura, and the Sierra, have seen fit to enter into contract under that act with the Government, and all of these have recently canceled their contracts with the Government upon the ground that they were losing money, and have gone out of business.

In other words, the compensation of $2 per mile is so unattractive and unprofitable that none of the seven American steamships plying the Pacific are willing to carry our mails at this price. The situation with respect to South America, with the exception of Venezuela, is even worse. For seventeen years the Postmaster-General has been ready and willing and anxious to employ American steamships to take our mails to and from South American countries, but no American shipowner has been found who is willing to perform that service for the compensation provided, with the result that to-day not a letter nor a postal card, nor a pound of mail of any kind is carried from any South Atlantic or Gulf port to any country in South America, except Venezuela, upon a steamship of any kind floating the American flag.

Moreover, not a single American steamer of any kind or class is to-day running between this country and Brazil, or any South American country, except Venezuela. If we are willing that our work should be done by Asiatics, we can get it done at Asiatic prices. If we want it done by Americans, we must pay American prices. It has been demonstrated that we can not get our mails carried to South America in American bottoms at the price fixed by the act of 1891.

Mr. President, the condition of our postal communication with South America is a disgrace to our Government and people. The only steamship communication, either commercial or postal, we have with this country, with the exception of Venezuela, is by foreign ships, not one of which is of the first or second class and most of which are below the third class, all running upon slow and irregular schedules, when, indeed, they attempt or pretend to operate under any schedule at all. They are practically freight steamers and where they have any passenger accommodations at all they are of the crudest and most primitive character. Under these conditions we must either send our mail to South America by these slow and irregular channels, or we must send it across the Atlantic to Europe and then across the Atlantic again to its destination. As a matter of fact, to secure greater dispatch, a large part, perhaps the major part, of our foreign mail to South America goes by way of Europe. In his report for 1907 the superintendent of the foreign mail service says that in the last year the bulk of our mail to South America was sent by way of Europe, because business men of this country engaged in business with South America found that was the most expeditious method of communication with their customers in that country.

I have a letter written to me by the Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General, Mr. Hollyday, dated March 5, which shows, even more clearly than the statement of the superintendent of foreign mails, the wretched conditions of our postal communication with South America. It is short and I will read it, because it discloses a most amazing condition in our postal relations with this country. I do not just at the moment find the latter in the mass of papers before me. I am afraid I have misplaced it or failed to bring it with me. I regret that this is so, but I can state the substance of it. In substance he says that during the month of February just passed there was only one dispatch of mail from this country to Brazil and other South American ports, and he adds that the irregular sailings slated for the present month will enable the Department to avoid dispatches by way of Europe.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suppose the Senator means direct to South America?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course. I understood the Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General to mean that we had only one direct dispatch of mail to South America during February. I regret I can not find the letter among the mass of matter I have before me.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course.

Mr. FOSTER. While the author of the bill, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], is on his feet I should like to ask him a question for information only. Why is it that the provisions of this bill are limited to South America, the Philippines, Japan, China, and Australasia, and not to Central America? Why is Central America excluded from the provisions of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, those of us who looked into that matter were of the opinion that the urgent necessity was to get communication with Brazil and Argentina; that the 4,000-mile route would apply to those countries, as well as to the oriental countries, and that we should make provision for such service at the present time. More than that, our trade will largely be with South America, rather than with Central America, and it is much more important, I think, that we should develop that trade.

Mr. SIMMONS. Besides that, if the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, I think our trade with Central America and our communication is in much better condition than with South America.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is in better condition at the present time. Of course we have no communication with South America.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me to make an inquiry in that connection of the Senator from New Hampshire, who is the author of the bill, while he is on his feet, I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if the 4,000-mile limit would not exclude Venezuelan ports? Is not Venezuela nearer than 4,000 miles?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and we have the Red D Line to Venezuela at the present time, sailing from New York. They are third-class vessels, but we have communication with Venezuela.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I have stated several times that Venezuela was an exception to the conditions that I have been relating. We now have not adequate, but fairly good communication with Venezuela. There is a line of steamers running there—though they are small steamers.

Mr. GALLINGER. We have a little line running there and they get a subvention under the act of 1891.

Mr. BACON. I suppose of course the 4,000-mile limit was fixed advisedly, and therefore I should like to know from the Senator from New Hampshire what is the first South American port, taking the starting point, say, at the South Atlantic ports, that would be available under that 4,000-mile limit?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course the ports that we are much more interested in than any others are Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Ayres.

Mr. BACON. Well, how far is it to those places? I presume the Senator has taken his distances from New York.

Mr. GALLINGER. From New York.

Mr. BACON. And it would be less from South Atlantic ports?

Mr. GALLINGER. It would be less from Southern ports, of course. The distances, I will say——

Mr. SIMMONS. To Australasia via Hawaii it would be 7,300 miles. That is the longest distance. The shortest distance to any foreign port included in the provision of the amendment is 5,000 miles.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from North Carolina will permit me a moment, there is not much difference between the Atlantic and Gulf ports in this respect. To Rio Janeiro is 5,000 nautical miles; to Buenos Ayres, 6,000; to Hawaii, Japan, China, and the Philippines, 6,000; to Hawaii, Japan, China, and the Philippines, 6,500, and via Hawaii to Australasia, 7,300 miles.

Mr. BACON. The only point I felt interested in was to know whether the 4,000-mile limit would make available any of the South Atlantic ports.

Mr. GALLINGER. Absolutely.

Mr. BACON. All of them?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and the Gulf ports.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have stated in general terms that the shortest route would be 5,000 miles.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have succeeded, now, in finding the letter from the Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to which I referred a moment ago, and I will read it. It is dated March 6, 1908, and is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, March 5, 1908.

DEAR SENATOR: Referring to your personal call at this office yesterday, I beg to advise you that during the month of February one dispatch of mail was made from this country for Brazilian and other South American ports, namely, on the 6th. During this month there will be irregular sailings which will enable us to avoid dispatches of mail via Europe.

Respectfully, yours, JOHN W. HOLLYDAY,
Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate.

Think of that, Mr. President—only one dispatch of mail from this country to Brazil and other South American ports during the month of February. South America is a great country, larger by far in area than our own, with a rich and productive soil, inhabited by an intelligent, energetic, and progressive people, whose foreign trade, already valuable, is rapidly expanding. It is not only a part of our own hemisphere and bound to us by strong political ties, but there are many reasons connected with its climate, with the habits and pursuits of its people, why it should be a great consumer of our products, especially of our manufactured products. To this great country, with which we are trying to strengthen our social, political, and business relations, we had during the month of February only one dispatch of mail.

When at the Post-Office Department a few days ago I inquired how they kept up with the irregular sailings referred to in the letter of the Acting Second Assistant Postmaster-General. In response to this inquiry I was advised that just before these sailings the company notifies the Post-Office Department of the day and hour of these sailings and the Department orders the mail sent forward.

I think in the face of these facts further comment upon this phase of the subject is unnecessary.

Mr. President, the proposition before us is not a proposition to repeal the act of 1891. That act is the law of the land and has been for the last seventeen years. Nobody has offered a bill to repeal it. The bill before us simply proposes to amend that act, without extending its principles, for the purpose of correcting certain demonstrated irregularities and making it workable in the dispatch of our mails to South America and the Orient as well as to Europe; to amend it so as to allow the Postmaster-General to pay to the highest class steamers which the exigencies of our commerce and postal communication with South America and the Orient require and justify the same compensation for carrying our mails to those countries as the original act allows him to pay to the luxuriously appointed and swifter steamers plying between New York and Europe for the same service; to amend it so that a ship speeding 20 miles an hour may not be paid twice as much for carrying our mails from New York to Europe as one steaming 16 miles an hour is paid for carrying it to China, Japan, Rio, and Buenos Ayres.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SIMMONS. With pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina to the fact that the bill which became a law in 1891 when it passed the Senate contained the same provision that is now applied in this bill to 16-knot steamers.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. A consideration of the relation and requirements of our trade with South America and the Orient, as compared with that of North Atlantic ports with Europe, leads me to conclude that a mistake was made in striking it out.

Mr. President, I repeat, this is not a proposition to repeal the act of 1891; it is a mere proposition to amend it so that a 20-knot steamship like those of the Cunard Line and the White Star Line, fitted up to accommodate the taste and fancy of the rich and aristocratic travel between New York and London, or Paris, or Hamburg, shall not be paid twice as much for carrying the mails as is paid to the less pretentious, but to the business involved, equally satisfactory steamships running to Sydney, Hongkong, Rio, and Buenos Ayres.

Whatever may be said of the act of 1891, the proposed amendment to that act is not in any sense a subsidy. It simply puts our mail carriers upon the Pacific Ocean and upon South Atlantic waters upon an equal footing in the matter of compensation with those upon the Northern Atlantic and allows the receipts from our ocean mail service to be used for its improvement and betterment.

I have no sympathy with bonuses and subsidies, but where a great public object is to be accomplished, where the benefits to accrue to the public is incalculable, I would not oppose legislation to secure these benefits because the individual agencies through which these results must be worked out derive some incidental benefit, trifling in amount compared with that derived by the public. That is not legislation for private profit, but for public benefit. I am opposed to a protective tariff. I am now and I always have been in favor of a tariff for revenue, with incidental protection. That was the platform upon which Democracy won its first great national victory after the war. That is the principle upon which every Democratic tariff bill promulgated since the war has been framed. In levying a tariff to raise revenue to support the Government I believe in placing a duty upon foreign products sold in this country in competition with like home products sufficient to equal the difference between the labor cost of that product here and abroad. The American laborer is entitled to this equalization, whether his competitor is a European or an Asiatic laborer, and the whole country participates in the prosperity which comes to him as a result. The object accomplished is a public object. To levy a higher duty for this purpose than is necessary to equalize these labor conditions would be a private bounty and wrong.

Mr. President, international as well as domestic trade depends upon transportation, not only of merchandise but of the mails, through which business engagements are induced, initiated, and consummated. Commercial and postal communication are in a sense interdependent—there will be little commerce without postal communication and little postal communication without commerce. If the commerce between foreign ports is large the amount of mail matter will be large. Where the business is large, as between New York and London and Hamburg, there is no trouble about getting ample and quick transportation for both merchandise and mail, but where it is small, as between this country and South America and the Orient, the situation is different. In such a case the question is, Will we leave these great independent interests to their own resources to find such transportation as they can and to develop under the slow and tedious process of inadequate facilities controlled by hostile and unfriendly interests, or will we stimulate and quicken their development by helping to secure quick and adequate facilities of transportation and communication?

That is our problem to-day with South America and, to a lesser degree, with the Orient. It is the same problem which confronted us fifty years ago in the development of our internal domestic commerce. We had a great country, stretching from ocean to ocean, covering over three and a half billion square miles, but it was poorly linked together; its widely separated parts needed to be brought into communication by rail and water. I need not stop here to recount in detail the many ways in which the Government, the States and their subdivisions, and the people lent their cooperation to encourage and aid in securing our present vast and comprehensive system of inland rail and water transportation and postal communication, nor what we are still doing in that direction.

During the past forty years the National Government has spent millions upon millions of dollars in the improvement of our rivers and harbors, and the Government, the States, the counties, and towns, by way of subscription and donation, have invested many more millions to aid private capital in the construction of railroads and to provide inland transportation to accommodate the needs of intercourse and postal communication and for marketing and distributing the products of our fields, forests, mines, and factories.

Wherever the pioneer has gone we have soon sent to him the railroad, with its postal and express facilities. If we could not send the railroad to him we have sent the mail carrier. Likewise with our rural population, without counting the cost—over the plains and across the mountains—wherever he has builded his habitation we have sent the mail carrier to take to him his letters and papers. First by the star route and stagecoach we dispatched once a week the mails to the rural postoffices along their lines, and on Saturday the farmer went for his letters and his weekly paper. It was an inexpensive service, but it was not what the public interest required; it was not what the farmer was entitled to receive at the hands of the Government. In response to this demand we decided to give the farmer a daily mail delivered at his gate, and to-day we are paying approximately 38,000 rural carriers a salary of $75 per month to ride over 38,000 rural routes every day, without reference to the amount of mail matter each distributes and without reference to whether the receipts of the route he serves are sufficient to pay his salary or only a small part of it.

Starting with a small beginning a little over fifty years ago we have in that short space of time built up the best and most comprehensive domestic system of rail transportation and postal communication in the world. With these unrivaled facilities of transportation and communication as a chief factor in our development, we have in an incredibly short time become the greatest producing nation, with the greatest domestic market, in the world. We are not only producing nearly everything we consume, but much more of many things than we can consume. The question with the American manufacturer is no longer one of supplying home consumption, but to find other markets for what we can not consume, and the problem which confronts him is no longer one of inland, but one of ocean transportation. Pressed to find a market for their products to relieve the congestion at home and to make possible further industrial expansion, they are anxiously looking abroad, and everywhere we are beginning to hear the cry, "To the sea; to the sea!" It comes to us from the factory, the mine, the forest, and the field.

We have not by any means reached the limit of our industrial growth. We have only fairly begun. With equal and adequate sea transportation, we may hopefully look for our growth in world trade during the next quarter of a century to become as striking as has been the growth of our home trade during the last quarter.

In the industrial and commercial condition which confronts us to-day equal and adequate deep-water transportation and communication to and with the countries upon whom we must rely for the sale of the surplus products of our mines, mills, and factories has become, or soon will become, almost as pressing a question as that of domestic transportation in the last three or four decades. Unfortunately, upon the deep seas we have at present practically no transportation except such as our competitors in trade have graciously furnished us. Because it is to their interest to do it, the great commercial nations of Europe now furnish us ample transportation for our trade with them.

Great Britain, Germany, and France need our foodstuffs to feed their millions of operatives and they need our raw cotton to operate their mills and spindles to make the fabrics with which they clothe the world. They stand ready at all times to furnish us ships not only to transport these products to their own ports, but to furnish us with such of their own products as we may stand in need of. Europe already takes all of our surplus in agricultural products—our manufactured products they do not to any considerable extent need. But we can not rely upon the maritime nations of Europe to furnish us equal and adequate transportation to Africa, to Australia, to Asia, and South America, upon whom we must chiefly rely as purchasers of our manufactures. Neither of these countries are maritime nations; like ourselves, they have no deep-sea merchant marine, and in present conditions we are not able to help them and they are not able to help us in the matter of transportation. If we want to get our reasonable share of the trade of these countries we must have transportation and postal facilities with them equal to those of our competitors in that trade. This our European competitors will certainly not furnish to us, and if we get it we will have to supply it ourselves.

I recognize the difficulties in the way of building up our deep-sea merchant marine in the face of present conditions. I know that men do not invest their money in enterprises from motives of patriotism; they must see a reasonable prospect of profit. Upon the ocean competition is free—our tariff laws and our exclusion laws do not protect there.

In several respects our competitors on the sea have us at a disadvantage. First, the greater cost of building a ship in America; second, the greater cost of operating a ship manned by American seamen; third, the fact that our competitors upon the ocean are paid more for carrying the ocean mail of their own country than we pay. The difference in the cost of ships has been in part overcome by removing the Dingley tariff duties on materials entering into the construction of American-built ships. It may be altogether overcome by admitting to American registry ships built abroad and owned by American citizens. This can be done without serious injury to anyone, because but few ships in our foreign trade are now built in our own shipyards. Of course the higher rate of pay for carrying the mails is a difference which can only be met by our paying a higher rate. If other things were made equal, I think our postal rate will not be so far below that of other nations that our shipowners could not overcome this difference and maintain themselves in competition with them.

The most serious difficulty is the greater cost of operating our ships on account of the higher wages paid American seamen and sailors. If it were competition between white labor, the problem would not be so difficult. The greater efficiency of the American sailor, like that of the operative in our cotton factories and our factories for making machinery and agricultural implements, would in a measure compensate for the higher wages received and enable the shipowner, as the cotton manufacturer and the maker of machinery and agricultural implements, to meet European competition. But it is not Caucasian competition, it is Asiatic competition, especially on the Pacific and largely in our South American trade, because, whether the ship in those waters is a Japanese, English, or German ship, as a rule it is largely manned by Chinese or Japanese sailors, willing to work for a price at which a white man would starve. By our immigration laws we have protected American labor on the mainland against Asiatic competition, but these beneficent laws do not extend to the high seas. The ocean is free, and upon it everybody is equal.

It is a great and difficult problem, which will grow more pressing as the years go by. It can not be ignored or pushed aside; it must be met and solved. For myself, I have an abiding confidence that the wisdom of American statesmanship and the pluck, energy, and enterprise of our people will, in the end, solve it wisely and justly, and that our flag will regain its prestige upon the seas.

Undoubtedly both Germany and England will gladly continue to furnish us transportation for any business we may have with these countries; but in the future, as in the past, they will furnish such transportation for this purpose as will make our competition with them for the trade of these countries hopeless.

No better evidence of this statement, Mr. President, is needed than a comparison between the small lines of slow-going, poorly equipped steamers which the English and Germans are to-day running between this country and the important countries of South America and the five first-class mail and passenger lines of swift and commodious steamers which they and our other European competitors are now operating on regular schedules from their own countries to Rio de Janeiro, Buenos Ayres, and other important South American points.

Having surrendered to our European competitors the control of our means of transportation and communication with South America, they have arranged it most admirably to promote their own advantage—they carry our mails for us, but they take twice as long as they do to carry their own; they carry our commercial products, but they charge a higher price than they charge for carrying their own. Sometimes they provide passenger accommodations, but they are so poor and the journey so tedious and slow the American business man whose business takes him to this country generally finds it preferable to go first to Europe and then by one of the swift and luxurious steamers that they have provided for the accommodation and dispatch of their own business with these countries.

Mr. President, no country outside of Europe would seem to offer better opportunity for the sale of our manufactures than China and South America. They are an agricultural people and buy in considerable quantities lines of manufactures that we produce in excess of home consumption and that we have demonstrated our ability to make and sell at a satisfactory profit in these markets in competition with our European competitors.

Our manufacturers recognize these facts, and in recent years they have been making special effort to get a foothold in these markets for their products. This is especially true of our manufacturers of machinery and agricultural implements and cotton goods, who have in recent years shown their ability to meet the prices of their English and German competitors in these markets. Mr. President, not only South America, but most of the countries of the Orient, by reason of the character of their pursuits, the habits of their people, and on account of their climate, have great need for cotton goods and for machinery and agricultural implements. If I had time I would like to discuss more fully the possibilities of enlarging our trade with these countries in the sale of machinery and agricultural implements. It is a very interesting subject, but I have not the time, without trespassing too greatly upon the time of the Senate, but I do wish to briefly call attention to the present condition, with respect to markets for their surplus, of our cotton mills in the South and to the efforts our cotton manufacturers have made in recent years to secure a part of this trade and what has been the result.

Our cotton mills are making, as everybody knows, more cloths than we need at home. Our domestic demand, great as it is, is no longer sufficient to consume their present output. We have got to find a market for this surplus, or this great industry of the South and New England has reached the limit of its expansion, and we have got to stop, for a while at least, building new mills and enlarging old ones, although we do not now manufacture over one-third of the raw cotton we produce. Our European competitors manufacture the other two-thirds, and with their ships sailing every sea and going to every quarter of the globe they find a market for all they make. We have the raw cotton and we have the factories, or we have the money with which to build the factories. We can convert this cotton into cloths and sell it in the competitive markets of the world as cheaply as our competitors, but we have not the ships to carry them to these foreign customers, and as a result of all our efforts to find a market for this surplus the maximum of our exports of cotton goods for any one year has never reached as much as $50,000,000, and that has fallen off materially in the last two years. Last year our exports of cotton goods did not reach half that amount.

Mr. President, if we had the same transportation and postal facilities which our competitors have for reaching the markets of the world, we could, and in the next ten or fifteen years we would, manufacture half of our raw cotton instead of one-third, and find a market for the converted product. That would mean not only employment to many thousand more operatives, but it would mean the greatest development in the cotton-growing and cotton-manufacturing States in the next two decades which has ever taken place in the same length of time in any other country in the world.

I have in my hand a book—I call it a book because it is in the form of a book, though it is not in a literal sense such—published by a distinguished citizen of North Carolina in 1900, for the purpose of showing the difference between the value of the raw cotton grown in North Carolina and what would be its value converted into cotton fabrics. It is a very interesting book. One one side of each page is a sample of a cotton fabric manufactured in North Carolina, and on the other is a comparison between the value of the cotton crop of that State, estimated in the year in which this book was published at 500,000 bales, and what would be the value of that amount of cotton converted into that particular fabric.

On the first page is a sample of what is known as "3-yard drill." It is, I believe, the cheapest goods made by our North Carolina mills. At the time this book was printed cotton was selling at 6 cents per pound and the estimated value of the crop for that year is $15,000,000, and in that year 3-yard drill, like the sample, sold for 16 cents per pound, and the estimated value of the North Carolina cotton crop converted into these drills is $40,000,000. On the next page is a sample of North Carolina "sheeting," and the difference between the North Carolina cotton crop in the raw state and manufactured into this product is estimated at $30,000,000. On the next is bleaching. The difference between the North Carolina cotton crop in its raw state and its value converted into this cloth in that year is estimated at $35,000,000. Then we have "cheviot," with a difference of $50,000,000 between the raw cotton and the finished product. The next is "6-ounce denim," with a difference in value between raw cotton and the manufactured product of $60,000,000, and then ginghams, with a difference in value of $75,000,000, and so on until we reach the highest grade of cotton goods then made in North Carolina, known as "fancy ginghams," and here the difference in value is estimated at $535,000,000.

Mr. President, North Carolina—and I say it with pardonable pride—is the only cotton-producing State in the Union which manufactures as much cotton as it produces. The story of that State's exceptional material development in the two decades through which we have just passed; of how, starting almost at the foot, it has within that short space of time advanced to the front of the column in the march of industrial progress; of how in the last decade it has surpassed all of its sister States in the average percentage of material development has become a familiar story and one which has excited universal astonishment as well as admiration. If we should look for the causes of this wonderful growth and development we would find many, but next to the energy and intelligence of its people we would find the chiefest of all of them in the fact that we are manufacturing all the cotton we make, or rather as much cotton as we make, and that instead of realizing from fifteen to twenty-five million dollars from our annual crop we are realizing from two to three hundred millions for the fabric which we weave out of it. If every cotton State of the South would do what North Carolina is to-day doing and could enter the markets of the world and find purchasers for their products, in twenty-five years, yea, in less time, the South would be the most marvelously rich country upon which God's sun has ever rose and set.

I know of no reason why we can not manufacture the most of this cotton and find markets for it, as our European competitors now manufacture two-thirds of it and find markets for it, except that we have practically no transportation beyond the water's edge save such as is furnished to us by countries which have an interest in keeping us out of markets which are now almost entirely supplied from their own factories.

Mr. President, some of our Southern cotton mills are largely dependent on foreign markets for the sale of their products. In recent years they have been making strenuous efforts to sell their surplus products both in China and South America. With the aid of our consuls in those countries and that of the special investigators sent out by the Government they have learned what kind of goods those markets require, and they have been making their goods in accordance with those requirements. What, Mr. President, has been the result of these efforts? With China we started off well. In 1903 we sold her cotton goods to the value of about $10,000,000; in 1904, about $9,000,000; in 1905, $30,000,000; but as soon as we began to be troublesome to our competitors in this market, through their control of our means of transportation they put the screws upon us, and our trade with China began to fall off. In 1906 it fell to $20,000,000, while in 1907 it fell to less than $3,000,000, while in the latter year Great Britain's sales to her advanced to about $43,000,000, and Japan's, which in 1905 was only about one-sixteenth as great as ours, advanced to nearly the same figures as ours. In South America they have not let us get much of a foothold at any time. In 1906 Argentina bought about $29,000,000 worth of cotton goods. We sold her in that year only $271,500 worth. In that year Brazil bought about $15,000,000 worth of cotton goods, of which we sold her only $479,300. In that year the countries of South America bought $74,712,400 worth of cotton goods. Of this amount Great Britain sold in round numbers $47,000,000; German, $11,000,000; France, $5,400,000; Italy, over $7,000,000, and the United States only $3,630,100.

There may be, as has been frequently suggested, several minor obstacles such as establishing agencies upon the ground, lack of adequate exchange facilities, etc., in the way of our getting our reasonable share of the trade of these countries, but the real reason is our slow, inefficient, inadequate, and expensive means of transportation and postal communication as compared with the cheaper and up-to-date service in these regards of our competitors. And that condition will not change for the better just so long as we allow, as we do now, our competitors for this trade to own, regulate, and control the instrumentalities of our commercial and postal communications with these countries.

Mr. President, we are told on the one hand that we can secure reasonably adequate transportation in our own ships to accommodate our trade, present and prospective, with the countries upon whom we must rely to sell the finished products of our cotton mills by paying out of the profits we now realize from our foreign mail service to the slightly slower ships required to accommodate this trade the same price for carrying the mail that we are now paying to the faster ships that have been constructed to accommodate the rich and aristocratic travel between this country and Europe. On the other hand, we are told we must not do this, we must suffer conditions to remain as they are, that our competitors must not be disturbed in their possession of these rich markets, that their doors must remain closed to the products of American labor and capital, because, forsooth, it is claimed that in providing this transportation under the ægis of the American flag we will have to pay the American shipowner for carrying the mail on quick and regular schedules something more than we are now paying to the foreign shipowner to carry it on slow and irregular schedules; because some private interest may be incidentally advanced and promoted; because the American shipowner may receive a trifle more than they think is fair and just for the service performed, although after seventeen years it has been shown he can not perform it for less, we should forego these vast public benefits, continue the embargo upon our trade with these countries and place a disheartening limitation upon the expansion of the greatest industry, not only in my own State, but in the South and in New England.

Calmly, dispassionately, and laboriously, with no thought except to discharge my duty to the public and to the country, I have studied and investigated and probed, that I might find out and understand all the facts, and in the light of these facts discharge the duty which my commission as a member of this body imposes upon me. Mr. President, I am not infallible—no man is; I can not see—no man can see—farther than the light which has been given me will let me see. I may err in my position in this matter as I have erred in many things before; but employing such powers of mind and heart as have been given me, my duty in this matter seems as clear to me as the sun on a cloudless day. If I should fail to discharge this duty as my mind and conscience have shown it to me because of a fear that some, through a misunderstanding of the facts, and others through prejudice based on a misunderstanding of the facts or otherwise, may disapprove and censure, I should be unworthy of the seat I now occupy in this Chamber and of the great and enlightened people whom I, in part, have the honor to represent on this floor. During all my public life I have taken counsel from that "still, small voice" which never fails to speak its counsel to the willing mind and heart, and I will not now turn a deaf ear to its whisperings.

Mr. President, there are other phases of this question of large and far-reaching importance which I would like to discuss, but they have been discussed by others, and I will not detain the Senate to give expression to my views with regard to them, because I feel that I have already trespassed too long upon its time, and because I know Senators are anxious to take up the regular business assigned to consideration after the expiration of the morning business.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, before the matter passes from consideration of the Senate, a question in regard to it. We know the fact that the present law has failed to induce the organization of steamship lines which will give us direct trade communication with South American ports, I will say, without going into the question of oriental ports.

I desire to know from the Senator whether investigation has been made to such an extent as to give assurance that upon the passage of this bill the conditions will be different, and that there will be steamship lines organized, and to what extent they may be anticipated.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that careful inquiry has been made and assurances have been given that if the amount of compensation given to first-class steamships shall be given to second-class steamships, lines will undoubtedly be established to Brazil and Argentina and at least two lines across the Pacific.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator understand that the lines to Argentina and Brazil will be separate lines, or that the same lines will carry to the ports of both countries?

Mr. GALLINGER. The expectation is that if there is more than one line—and there may be three—they will not all go from the same port. The Postmaster-General has that in his discretion, and I have no idea that he would permit more than one line to be established at any given port. It would not be good business policy for him to do it.

Mr. BACON. It is certainly not desirable that there should be, because we all know, of course, if there is more than one from one port what that port will be; and it is very desirable, if this policy should be inaugurated, that there should be a general enjoyment of the benefits of it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New Hampshire neglected to state that the bill would probably inaugurate a line from the Pacific coast to Australasia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, certainly, that is in contemplation.

CERTAIN LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FRYE. I call up Senate joint resolution No. 40.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 40) to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, having a subject somewhat germane to the canal question, I will briefly occupy the time of the Senate.

On the 3d of February a bill was introduced in this body by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] at the request of the Secretary of the Navy, providing for a continuance for a period of two years of certain surface tracks on streets leading to the navy-yard. It appeared that by existing law the railroad company was required to remove the tracks in question on the 28th day of February. The Committee on the District of Columbia could not perceive any special advantage in extending the time for the removal of the tracks for two years without making some provision for another connection in the meantime to the navy-yard, because it was apparent that after the lapse of two years we would be compelled, in the absence of any other connection, to extend the time again.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the subject upon which the Senator from Montana is addressing the Senate is an important one and relates to a matter Senators ought to be advised about. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ankeny	Dick	Hale	Paynter
Bacon	Dillingham	Heyburn	Perkins
Bankhead	Dixon	Hopkins	Piles
Borah	Dolliver	Johnston	Rayner
Bourne	du Pont	Kean	Scott
Brown	Elkins	Knox	Simmons
Burkett	Flint	Lodge	Stephenson
Burrows	Foraker	Long	Taylor
Carter	Foster	McCreary	Teller
Clay	Frazier	McLaurin	Warren
Crane	Frye	Martin	Wetmore
Culberson	Fulton	Nelson	Whyte
Cullom	Gallinger	Newlands
Curtis	Gamble	Nixon
Depew	Guggenheim	Overman

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator from Montana allow me one word?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I am hoping to get a vote on the joint resolution within an hour, and I trust that Senators will remain at least that length of time, in order that the lack of a quorum may not be developed when the joint resolution is on its final passage.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think it is but just to say that it was not upon my insistence that Senators were called from their several tasks in their committee rooms, nor did the Senator from Maine prefer his request on my motion so as to keep an audience here during the few remarks I am about to make.

I was proceeding, Mr. President, to call attention to a subject which has challenged the notice of the Senate and has attracted attention elsewhere, and to the end that Senators who were not present in the Chamber at the moment may be advised, I will recapitulate briefly the few observations I made prior to the order of the roll call.

On the 3d of February the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, presented, at the request of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, a bill extending for the period of two years the right of a railroad company to maintain tracks on certain streets leading to the navy-yard. It was urged that these tracks, in the absence of this legislation, must be taken up on the 28th of February, to the very great inconvenience of the navy-yard and its source of supplies.

The Committee on the District of Columbia referred that bill to a subcommittee, of which I was made chairman. The subcommittee concluded that the extension of time, without providing in the interval for the construction of some other rail connection with the navy-yard, would leave the Government after the lapse of two years in precisely the same predicament of to-day. So the bill was amended, and the amendment was subsequently adopted by the committee. The amendment required that the railroad company should proceed within the period of six months to construct a rail connection with the navy-yard along the banks of the Anacostia River.

To that amendment the railroad company took serious exceptions. The bill was passed by the Senate once, and on demand for a hearing the vote by which it was passed was reconsidered to the end that objections might be heard. That was a proper proceeding.

Upon hearing it was alleged by the railroad company that about 3,600 feet of track which we ordered constructed by the bill would cost about $300,000, including the right of way, and it was insisted that the demand was unreasonable and unjust.

The bill was finally passed as amended, with a very slight concession upon the part of the Government, whereby we granted the right of way over public land and agreed to a contribution of $25,000 for the purchase of a right of way over private holdings. It was insisted that this contribution was inadequate, but nevertheless it is the belief of all that the road will finally be constructed.

Then attached to the bill was a proviso that pending this new construction the present tracks might remain where they are, but not to exceed two years. In the course of the consideration of the proposed amendment attorneys of the railway company called attention to their desire for an amendment which would confirm their right of way, occupied since some time in the early seventies across the Anacostia flats. The committee declined to entertain such an amendment to the bill. But the reason urged for the amendment led to an inquiry into certain legislation that had theretofore passed through Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Montana kindly suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary?

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. HALE. Let the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection it is so ordered. The Senator from Montana will proceed.

Mr. CARTER. There was presented to the subcommittee as explanatory matter a brief of the facts signed by the Hon. Wayne MacVeagh. That name attached to the brief carried to my mind a certain degree of assurance that the facts therein stated were correctly stated. Mr. MacVeagh, as is known throughout the country, is a lawyer of recognized ability, formerly Attorney-General of the United States, and a man of high probity of character.

It appeared from this statement that in 1904 a bill had passed Congress directing the Secretary of War to deed block 1131 in the District of Columbia to a Mr. Sidney Bieber. That bill, as set forth in this statement of facts, had been regularly introduced, regularly referred to the War Department, commented upon by the officers of the District of Columbia, finally reported from the committee, and passed. It passed both Houses of Congress.

It is noteworthy that in the comments of the chairman of the Board of Commissioners of the District of Columbia the statement is made that "the District has nothing to do with the matter; it is recommended that the bill be referred to the Secretary of the Interior or the Attorney-General." That disposes of the action of the District Commissioners.

The bill was referred to the War Department. The War Department reported that there was no such block of ground in existence as the particular block to which the bill referred, and one indorsement—the final one, I think—is that no objection can be seen to the passage of the bill. The bill was passed.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am afraid I do not understand the Senator, and I therefore interrupt him to ask him a question.

Did I hear him say that the War Department reported that there was no such block in Washington, and then indorsed the idea of granting the permission, or recommending Congress to grant the permission, to deed something that did not exist.

Mr. CARTER. I do not wish to have it understood that the language of the War Department was other than what I stated, that the Department could see no objection to its passage.

Mr. TILLMAN. In other words, they could see no objection to passing a bill to deed a piece of property that did not exist?

Mr. CARTER. That appears to have been the indorsement.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just wanted to get at the fact to see how the War Department does business, or how it did business then.

Mr. CARTER. The War Department in that behalf was probably following routine procedure. Congress has supreme authority over the public domain and the public property of the United States; and the War Department, in response to an inquiry from Congress relative to the propriety of passing a certain bill, responded that the Department did not know of any objection to its passage and had no knowledge of the existence of the block. That is the sum and substance of the combined recommendations and observations of the Department on the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. But subsequently the War Department conveyed that lot and took $1,000 as compensation for it.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Now, Mr. President, this block was subsequently conveyed by the War Department, having been surveyed as required by the bill, and the conveyance was made by the Department for the sum of $1,000. The block is 285 feet by 206 feet. The bill was passed to remove what was denominated a "cloud on the title" of the block, the title being claimed by Mr. Bieber. The cloud on the title was created by the deeding of the block before it was surveyed, by a man who had no more claim to it than the man in the moon, to a woman whose name appears on the District records as the grantee. This woman listed the lot for taxes. It was sold for taxes by the District Commissioners, and repeated sales occurred until finally the various tax titles became merged in the grantee from the Government, under the act of Congress, Mr. Bieber.

There is some semblance of shadow or claim of righteousness to that legislation, notwithstanding it may be justly alleged that the tax title had its inception in fraud, and that the fraud was consummated when the transaction was accomplished by alienating the title of the United States to perfect the mere shadow which Mr. Bieber's title constituted.

As to that there can be no complaint, however, because, as alleged, there was a certain openness about it all. Congress was not generally advised of the provisions of the bill. No one in this Chamber, I assume, knew when that bill passed that Congress was deeding or authorizing the conveyance of a tract of land 285 feet by 206 feet in this District to a person who held a mere shadow of claim based upon a tax title that had no virtue whatever. If the transaction had stopped at that point it would have been bad enough, but still not as bad as now.

The Senate at later dates had presented to it two other bills in furtherance of the same scheme. The public-building bill of 1906 embraced a section known as section 21, which authorized and directed the Secretary of War to convey three other blocks to Mr. Sidney Bieber in the same locality.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume I am right in saying that the bill came from another body containing that provision.

Mr. CARTER. I will touch that. Section 21 of the bill was framed in committee manifestly because it nowhere appears in the RECORD that it was offered as an amendment. This section 21 directed the surveyor of the District of Columbia to survey these three additional blocks. It directed the Secretary of War to convey to Sidney Bieber title to the three blocks—that is, all of the claim of the United States, which was the paramount and only outstanding title for such consideration as considering all the circumstances might seem just.

Within a short time after the approval of this act—it was approved June 30—some time in September, the Acting Secretary of War conveyed the three blocks to Mr. Bieber for $3,000, or thereabouts. Thus this gentleman became possessed of blocks of ground extending over a stretch of 1,600 feet by 285 feet in the District of Columbia for the sum of $3,000, or a small fraction above $3,000, plus $1,000 paid for the first block.

As to the bill of 1906, there is no pretense that any consideration was given to the subject anywhere. I find in the report which I have just received from the document room, dated June 25, 1906, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, Report No. 5011, a description of the purpose of each section of this bill of 1906—that is, the bill which contains section 21, and this is the reference made in the report to this particular section:

Section 21 authorizes the acquisition of certain triangles in the city of Washington.

Acquisition by whom? The only reasonable inference is an acquisition by the Government of the United States, because the bill was passed for the purpose of enabling the Government to purchase building sites. It carried about $26,000,000 for that purpose and the construction of buildings, and this, in so far as the records that I have been able to trace show, is the only statement of record in Congress concerning the purpose of section 21, which authorized and directed the Secretary of War to convey this body of property to a stranger who had neither claim nor shadow of claim to any part or portion of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand the Senator to state that section 21 had been put in the bill in conference?

Mr. CARTER. I did not so state. I will say to the Senator it was manifestly in the bill when reported from the committee. It was in the bill when it came to this body.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just wanted to know on that particular point, because I have known things slipping in in conference or put there by the conferees that were very fishy.

Mr. CARTER. Now, Mr. President, there was, I believe, about thirty-six hours of time for the consideration of that bill when it came to the Senate. On that point the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] is fairly well advised, and I should be glad to have him state, if he cares to do so, what the course of the bill was in this body.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, as the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] correctly states, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate had that bill for possibly thirty-six or forty hours. It was a bill carrying an appropriation of $26,000,000. Inquiry was made of the chairman of the committee of the House in regard to the provisions of the bill, we stating that we did not have time to take up the bill and consider it minutely, it being desired to report it back to the Senate so as to enable Congress to adjourn at the time that had been agreed upon between the two Houses. We were assured that the bill as it came from the other House had been carefully considered and scrutinized. Consequently the committee on this side only went over the matters which we had added to the bill after it came here, and the section which has been referred to was in the bill when it came to us.

Mr. CARTER. I endeavored to so state.

Mr. President, in due course of time the conveyance was made, as I have heretofore suggested, to this gentleman for these three blocks of land in addition to the first block.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator to again read that section, as importance has been given to it since he first read it.

Mr. CARTER. I will send it to the Secretary's desk and ask that it be read. It is section 21.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if he is shortly coming to a consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 40?

Mr. CARTER. I shall reach the canal portion of this subject very quickly. I will say to the Senator from Maine that I do not desire to consume time which I am aware he desires to have devoted to the consideration of his joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 21. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant and convey unto Sidney Bieber and his heirs and assigns all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to all of certain land in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, lying south of square 1123, 1148, and 1149, conforming with the metes and bounds of square 1131, and that part of square 1117 situated between the north lines of Water and I streets, the east line of Eighteenth street, and the west line of Nineteenth street, when said streets are extended, upon the payment by the said Sidney Bieber into the Treasury of the United States of such sum of money as the said Secretary of War, upon consideration of all the circumstances, shall determine proper to be paid for the said squares; and the surveyor of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to mark out such areas, to record plats, and to designate the proper square numbers.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. The section which has just been read was in the bill when it came to the Senate. I wish to say, in order to put the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in a proper light before this body, that the report which the Senator from Montana has been reading is the report of the House committee and not of the Senate committee.

Mr. CARTER. It is a report on this section 21. That conveyance was made, as I suggested, Mr. President, for the sum of substantially $3,000.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to have it made very clear from which body it was reported that section 21 referred merely to the conveyance of triangles.

Mr. CARTER. To the acquisition of titles to triangles.

Mr. KNOX. To the acquisition of triangles. Was that from the House or from the Senate committee?

Mr. CARTER. That was a House report. The report concerning the acquisition of the triangles described in section 21 was made to the House of Representatives.

The transaction, however, does not close at this point. Emboldened somewhat by unbroken success, this individual returns again in 1907, manifestly determined to pursue the lines of little resistance [laughter]; and we find in the public-buildings bill of 1907, as reported from the committee of the House of Representatives to that body, section 13, which directs the Secretary of War to convey an indefinite quantity of land to the purchaser from the United States of these several blocks previously acquired by Mr. Bieber. The bill does not name the grantee this time. Apprehensive that his name might become a danger sign and attract somebody's attention he preferred to pass under a general description which could be specifically applied only to one person—and that person himself. So the act of 1907 directed the Secretary of War to convey to this man all of the lands south of these blocks and between them and the channel of the Anacostia River.

In connection with that bill, I think it but fair to say that the report of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reads as follows:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds unanimously recommends the passage of this bill without amendment.

This bill is in the nature of an "omnibus correction bill" and merely corrects a number of errors which occurred in the public-building act of the first session of the present Congress.

This bill carries no authorization for the expenditure of any additional money.

Section 13 of the bill, to which that report refers, reads as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey to the purchaser from the United States of square No. 1131, and the south part of square No. 1117, and the squares south of squares Nos. 1123, 1148, and 1149, in the city of Washington, all the interest of the United States in the land lying south of the squares so purchased and between them and the channel of the Anacostia River, upon the payment by such purchaser into the Treasury of the United States of such sum of money as the said Secretary of War, upon consideration of all the circumstances, shall determine proper to be paid for the said land; and the surveyor of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to mark out such land and determine the areas, and to record a plat thereof.

Mr. TILLMAN. Who signed that report?

Mr. CARTER. That report was made by Mr. BARTHOLDT, of Missouri. In the consideration of the matter I find, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 25, 1907, this line of observations recorded:

A motion was made in the House of Representatives to take up the bill. The bill was read. Then follows:

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second——

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second and ask that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to have an explanation of this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands a second and asks unanimous consent that the second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Missouri is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from New York to twenty minutes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, this bill merely corrects a number of errors which occurred in the legislation had at the last session. It makes no appropriation, and all the changes provided for in this bill are to be made within the limits of cost heretofore fixed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the object of the bill?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will explain it to the gentleman.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman if there are any new constructions authorized in this bill?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. There is not one dollar's worth of new construction, nor is there a foot of ground authorized, but in some cases it was necessary to transfer from the appropriation made for the building to the appropriation made for the site because an additional small amount was necessary to procure the site which the people wanted.

Mr. MANN. Is the total cost of building and site in any case increased?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Not in one single instance.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to ask the gentleman another question. The first section of the bill is entirely new legislation. Now, do you apply it—I did not catch it as it was read—to the act passed June 20, 1906? It does not extend the authority of the Secretary over buildings hereafter to be constructed?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No, sir; it applies merely to the legislation of last session.

Mr. TAWNEY. What changes this bill would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make in buildings now authorized must be made within the limits of cost fixed by the act of June 30, 1906.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Exactly; the gentleman states it correctly.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman specifically mention the buildings which this affects?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It will take about twenty minutes to read all the changes.

Mr. CANDLER. I think it is necessary.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. In further explanation, I want to say that the Attorney-General has recently rendered an opinion that where the Congress has appropriated for a specific building and it should become necessary to locate in that building a room, for instance, for the customs service or internal-revenue service or Weather Bureau, or whatever the service may be, such a change can not be made unless we pass this legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, if the gentleman from Missouri will pardon me, I understand that as the law now is, if a certain amount of money is appropriated for a site, and a certain amount for building, and the site can be gotten cheaper or the site will cost more, thereby necessitating a difference in the proportion of the expenditure for the two things, that difference can not be met, and this bill will enable it to be met?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is it; exactly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand, furthermore, if the building is for a post-office, for example, and it is desired to hold court in the building, without some such legislation as this that could not be done?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It does not apply to courts. If Congress should authorize the holding of a court in a certain place where it had not been heretofore authorized, the amount heretofore fixed would not be sufficient to enable the Treasury Department to make a court-house out of it. So it does not apply to those cases.

Mr. CANDLER. Does it apply to the general appropriations for the post-office buildings throughout the country?

Mr. TAWNEY. Only those authorized by the act of June 30, 1906.

Mr. CANDLER. Is there anything in it with reference to Columbus, Miss.?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No, sir. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill as amended.

The question was taken; and in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

That is the whole record with reference to this bill for 1907, and so far as I know there is no other record with reference to the bill for 1906. I have not been able to prosecute a thorough search in that behalf, but I have no knowledge whatever of anything else having been said about either bill, in so far as sections 21 and 13 are concerned.

Mr. President, after the Senate had passed a bill repealing this section of 1907 the gentleman who was the beneficiary of these various acts—a nimble citizen, who was to me unknown at the time the report was made and is to me unknown to-day—comes forward and admits his existence and likewise admits the fact that he has the plunder in his possession to the extent given him by the two bills passed—those of 1904 and 1905—but avers that the whole transaction was known to everybody; that there was no concealment about it, and, further still, that the grants do not include a part of the grounds of the Hospital for the Insane and that it can not take in any part of the navy-yard; third, that this whole business ought to be condoned and that no accountability to the Government or to anyone else should obtain, because, foresooth, the information leading to the detection of this scheme was given by Mr. Wayne MacVeagh, an attorney for a railroad company.

Mr. MacVeagh was protecting his company's property, and the individual who seeks to avoid responsibility in the fashion Bieber adopts is on exactly the same plane as the crook with the stolen property on his body pointed out in the crowd and arrested, claiming that he had not stolen as much property as he was charged with stealing, and, moreover, that the man who had pointed him out was an unpopular citizen. [Laughter.] That is the whole story without any sort of exaggeration.

I do not make these observations for the purpose of casting any reflection on any Member of Congress. I do not believe that any intentional wrong was done by any Member of Congress; but I do know this, that the people of many of the States have thought proper to incorporate in their constitutions clauses prohibiting this kind of legislation. I do not know of a State which would authorize a grant of this sort to an individual or which could do so under its constitution. We have not in the Federal Constitution any such prohibition.

These corridors have been—probably more in days gone by than now—infested with a lot of slick and slimy self-seeking individuals seeking to profit by the confidence that men here assembled exhibit in their constituents and in those who petition here in good faith for relief. A character such as this Bieber, who comes forward again and again behind committee doors, insidiously and continuously pressing his claim, not in any public interest, but for private gain, is just about as dangerous in the presence or seen in the company of a public man as an ordinary Montana rattlesnake near your cot at night. This is the class of people who make it a business to trade on their supposed acquaintance with public men. One of them will approach you in the street, manage to walk with you a block, and then go out and point to the fact that he is on chummy terms with you; and so pointing out, will seek to profit, when your acquaintance with him is limited and your confidence does not exist at all. This sort of creature when foiled in his purpose or deflected from his course shows the venom fang of the reptile.

This individual, Sidney Bieber, seems to be an expert hand. I am informed he had himself placed on the retirement roll of the firemen's fund in the District of Columbia at $90 per month for life, on the ground that he was totally disabled. If he were in possession of all his faculties and full strength, I think really he would get the Capitol away from us in a very short time. [Laughter.] So there is some compensation in this man's misfortune and disability. He appears to me, from the general description, to be the Abe Ruef of the city of Washington—capable, slick, unscrupulous, and persistent, trading upon his acquaintance and imposing upon the confidence of men, and obtaining for himself unconscionable advantage through enactments surreptitiously passed in the closing hours of a session of Congress.

Now, Mr. President, in order to escape, this individual here in question would have it understood that all the land south of the blocks named in his deeds might not reach as broad an area as claimed and might not strike at vital public interests as deeply as claimed, but that is not the fault of Mr. Bieber. He did the best he could, and I venture to predict that if he had not been discovered, he would have come back again to get another slice of this country along the Anacostia River, which, according to Government projects, is to be improved by the expenditure of something like $3,000,000 of money taken from the people of the United States in taxation. If he does not threaten to cut off the navy-yard with the bill we have voted to repeal, it is so much the better for the Government, but it is no credit to him, because he got all he could.

Finally, Mr. President, I think this ought to lead to a clear understanding here that a gang of tax-title sharks, said to have been operating in this District for a long time, should be in some manner, by the District authorities, disposed of and rendered innocuous, at least. This great Government of ours is an impassive, though mighty force. If its public officers do not protect it, it will be plundered. The most extreme vigilance is evidently necessary in and about this District, which has no legislature of its own, in order to protect private right and public property as well.

I wish that Mr. Wayne MacVeagh, through whose pamphlet or brief these facts were brought to light, might get due credit, notwithstanding the fact that he happened to be the employee of a corporation at the time he did the work. I am sure that everyone desiring to prosecute an inquiry into this matter will be interested in reading what he wrote. What he wrote caused the Secretary of War to hold the enactment of 1907 up, and in his own language, as quoted to me, the Secretary ordered the Sidney Bieber bill to be kicked about the Department until Congress could further consider it. It was first passed from one division of the War Department to another, and finally referred to the Attorney-General for an opinion as to whether the Secretary of War was compelled by the act to make any conveyance at all. I ask, Mr. President, that that statement, which is instructive and exhaustive, be printed as a document, to the end that anyone desiring to become familiar with the facts as set forth by Mr. Wayne MacVeagh may do so. I ask that it be printed only down to the appendix.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator one question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If I correctly understood the reading of section 21 of the prior law, there is a provision that the Secretary of War should pay such an amount of money as he might deem to be proper after an investigation. That substantially is the provision. Has the Senator any information as to whether there was an investigation, and to what extent it proceeded?

Mr. CARTER. I understand there was quite an extensive investigation with reference to the act of 1907, which proposed to convey an indefinite area of land.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of the provision which required an investigation to determine how much should be paid by this man, and under which, as I understood the Senator to say, some three thousand and odd dollars were paid.

Mr. CARTER. I do not know what investigation was made in that case, but for the Senator's information I will make this statement: It appears by the record, as presented by Mr. MacVeagh, that Mr. Bieber offered to sell his tax-title claim to block 1131 in 1898 for $2,000. Later on he acquired full title to the property from the United States, together with the other block named. This line of proceeding was finally brought to light by his refusal to sell a small stretch or corner of two blocks, probably a third of one block and a sixth of another, on which the tracks of the railroad company rested, for the sum of $15,000. The statement is made that when they offered him $15,000 for a quitclaim deed of the land he had thus acquired, on which their tracks rested and had rested for a generation, he simply laughed and said he would bring them to time and get good round figures, or words to that effect.

Now, Mr. President, so far as this raid on public property is concerned, I have no information except that which I have given. The Senate will observe that the phraseology of the law did not direct an investigation by the Secretary of War, but said "considering all the circumstances of the case"—and the land grabber was to detail the circumstances regarding his ficticious claim to title, for surely no one else had been favored with any information.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I am a very patient man, but I must demand the regular order.

MATERIAL FOR CONSTRUCTION OF PANAMA CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine demands the regular order, which is Senate joint resolution No. 40.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 40) to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 10, after the word "purchase," it is proposed to insert the word "construct."

Mr. FRYE. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator who has this joint resolution in charge to some objections to it. The joint resolution provides—I am referring to what is left of it:

> That this resolution shall not apply to any foreign steamship chartered by the Panama Railroad Company to take the place of any of the present fleet destroyed or undergoing repairs, etc.

Then it provides "That the Isthmian Canal Commission is hereby authorized to purchase," etc. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the canal authorities are to purchase, it is hardly worth while to spend much time over the question as to what ports will have the benefit of this act. For myself, I am not in favor of authorizing the Canal Commission to do work that I think somebody else can do a great deal better. I do not know, of course, whether the Canal Commission would avail itself of this provision. But I think it is objectionable in the first instance, and I wish simply to register my objection against it. As the Senator from Maine, who has the joint resolution in charge, seems somewhat anxious to get a vote upon it, I merely desire to say a few words on another proposition.

Mr. President, the other day when this matter was up a question was raised whether it was better for the Canal Commission to manufacture its own cement or to buy it. I suppose the Canal Commission has the authority to manufacture cement if it sees fit. I stated the other day that I did not think there was sufficient material available on the Isthmus which could be used, economically at least, for making cement. Since that time I have gone over all the suggestions made in the report as to the character of the material that may be expected to be found. I find that the Commission is very hopeful, or their engineers are, that there is a vast quantity of material which may be used for the manufacture of cement. If you go carefully over the report itself you will find that it is a mere guess on the part of the engineers. There has been more guessing on this canal than on anything I have ever had anything to do with or any knowledge of.

I am not quite willing to take the suggestion of any engineer that there may be, or possibly is, plenty of material there, and that the Government shall expend a million and a half of money to erect a plant and then find, perhaps, that it has not the material, when there is an abundance of cement material in this country which can be manufactured at a reasonable rate and transported to the Panama Canal line, I believe, for one-half what it will be possible for the Canal Commission to make it for there. The Canal Commission's report, on the evidence of some engineer—and I do not remember who—says they think they can make the cement for about a dollar and thirty-four cents a barrel. They base that upon the theory that coal would cost them $4.50 a ton. Everywhere, practically, where they have fixed the price of coal, they have paid from $7.50 down to $6.50, instead of $4.50, and upon that basis, with coal at $4.50, instead of $6.50 or $7.50, they conclude they can make cement for $1.34 a barrel. Of course, in that they give the Government credit for the plant. If that can be done, it may be as cheap as they can buy the cement; but it is very uncertain whether it can be done.

I do not know that it is worth while to discuss this question, because we have no control over the Commission. I do not know whether a suggestion made here by the Senate that we should prefer to see them buy the cement than to make it would have any influence with them, because on several occasions Congress has abandoned control over the canal. However, I am not certain but that if they studied economy they would buy the cement and not make it.

Mr. President, I said the other day that I thought the estimate of 5,000,000 barrels, or about a million tons, of cement was grossly inadequate. I made that statement upon my general knowledge of what they proposed to do there and because it seemed to me that they must use a very large amount of cement. Since that time I have, as with the other question, gone over the matter, and I do not believe they will ever get through with the canal by the use of a million tons of cement. I should say it is very much more likely to be two and a half or three million tons. They have several enterprises for which they have made no estimates at all. They have a diversion canal, as to which they say they have not had sufficient time to make an estimate. That diversion canal must be composed very largely of cement or else the canal will wash away. The canal is for the purpose of taking care of the extra floods which are going to occur in the Chagres River, when it will not be safe to let it go into the dam.

Mr. President, I have not much confidence in these suggestions. In the first place, we were told after the Commission had been organized that they had found a place to build the dam where it would be eminently safe, and they made an estimate of the cost of the dam. Later they found that the engineers had been mistaken; that it was not possible to maintain a dam at that point. They abandoned that point and went down the river about 6 or 7 miles—I can not state it exactly, but somewhere in that neighborhood—to build another and a different dam. It is not so very astonishing that men may make mistakes, but we were told that there had been such a thorough examination by borings and otherwise that they knew the dam could be built at the first point. Now we are told with the same certainty that it can be built at another point 6 miles farther down the river.

They have the most extraordinary proposition I believe that ever was submitted to any people, which will require an immense amount of cement, as much I should say to make it perfectly safe as it will take to build these locks, or at least the first locks on the eastern side. The spillway in this case is in the middle of the dam, a thing most astonishing, I think, to any man who has ever given any attention to the question of dams and the dangers that come from them, from floods and so forth. Of course they have had engineers, and we are depending largely upon the engineers, but when engineers make a calculation one day and within a very short time make another and show absolutely that they were at fault at first, we naturally lose some confidence in their judgment.

The other day when we were talking about this question the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] called my attention to the Chagres River. That is the black feature of this whole thing, I know. It is the threatening feature of the whole canal, especially is it the threatening feature of a lock canal. Of course I do not want at this time to go into the question whether it should have been a lock canal or a sea-level canal. That has already been determined by the Senate; nor do I want to go into the character of the lock canal. There might have been a different lock canal, but I believe the Senate did not pass upon the question as to what should be the character of the lock canal, whether it should be a 60-foot canal or 85-foot canal, or whether it should be a canal 30 feet in height. But I regard that as left now to the Commission, and the Commission has established an 85-foot canal.

I have gone over with some care again the matter of the Chagres River, and while I knew for several years that it had been the doubtful feature of the canal when the French were building it, it seems to me that every time you look it over it grows more doubtful whether you can build a canal there and maintain it with that river. I desire to say now that, in my judgment, it can only be maintained by the use of a tremendous amount of good cement. The Commission say the whole enterprise depends upon the character of the cement used. Every business man, every man of common sense, knows that. If you put an inferior cement in the locks, there will be trouble in the future; and if you put inferior cement in the spillway, so that the spillway may break at any time, the dam would go out in two hours under that head of 85 feet of water. So the important question in the whole matter of the construction of the canal is what kind of cement you are going to get.

The matter of cement is as well settled in the United States as it is anywhere in the world. For a great many years we bought our cement from England or Europe. We now manufacture cement that we call Portland cement, because the Portland cement, which was the first cement we used in this country, came from Europe. We are making large quantities of cement in the State of Kansas, some in Missouri, some, I think, in Iowa, and in other States. Our cement has now reached a point where we know it is just as good as any other cement. There may be a little difference, but it is very small.

We have in this country an abundance of material from which to manufacture cement. I will venture to say that the Oklahoma region can produce all the material needed in order to make the cement for the canal, even if it takes twice as much as is estimated. They have the fuel and they have everything else there. They are only hampered by the fact that they are not on a water line. It can be manufactured undoubtedly in the Oklahoma country cheaper than in any other place on the American Continent, because they have natural gas in great quantity, and where they do not have gas they have an abundance of coal which is very cheap.

Kansas is to-day making large quantities of cement. We have been using it in Colorado in large amounts. The most important dam that has been built in this country for a good many years was for the Denver Water Company, in which they used entirely cement from Iola, Kans. Every barrel of that cement when it came there was opened and a competent man made a test to determine whether it was a proper barrel of cement or not, because in manufacturing cement you will frequently have good cement in one barrel and poor cement in the next one. No barrel of cement was accepted that did not come up to the standard, and when they got through they had a dam 210 feet high, holding a rapid stream and setting the water back 8 or 10 miles, and practically it was as solid as the adjoining hills. The cement set properly, and it had been built in with very large stones taken from the adjacent hills, and it is a solid barrier. You can make cement which will be just as good as the surrounding hills; but you do not always do it, and I doubt very much if you should attempt to make cement on the Isthmus with the character of labor they have and with the uncertainty as to the material, whether you would get a cement which would stand the test that the engineers of this country insist that every barrel of cement shall stand before it goes into an embankment or for any other purpose where force is to come against it.

So, Mr. President, I want to put myself on record in favor of the use of American cement, and if it costs $2 a barrel it will be cheaper than cement for nothing that does not come up to the standard. About the wisest thing I have heard from the Commission is the statement that the whole canal depends upon the kind of cement that goes into the locks. It is equally true in making these diversion canals. They have a scheme to carry the Chagres River at one point into the Pacific Ocean and at another point into the Atlantic Ocean. That river, with the rapid rise, which is sometimes as much as 40 and 50 and 60 feet above normal, going up to 80 feet frequently, is of such a character that it will not do to allow the water to run through an earth channel. It will have to be lined with cement and stone and masonry in order to make it perfectly safe, whether it goes east or whether it goes west.

The French had a scheme, which I think an absurd one, but I see that the Commission have indicated that they may follow it, of putting a trestle over the canal which would be 180 feet above the water. The great trouble is when you turn your river over there, and when you drop it on the other side you will wash away the whole country, or you must make calculations to drop it down by degrees.

The spillway of this dam, in my judgment, threatens the foundation of the dam unless for some distance below the dam there shall be a cement conduit to carry off the water. I can not find that they have calculated on anything more than dropping it just below the dam. That is in a gorge 268 feet deep with nothing but mud; no stone. No man living knows how deep it is from the surface of the bottom of the gorge, 268 feet deep, before you come to a solid foundation, and that is why I say no condition exists there which justifies them in saying that 5,000,000 barrels of cement is all they want.

It may not be a very practical suggestion as to the pending joint resolution, but it is an opportunity that I did not like to neglect, and I have taken it to call the attention of the authorities who are doing this work to the facts I have presented. Later, when we come to the question of an appropriation, I mean to call attention to some other things which I think the authorities ought to examine and consider before they go on with this work.

As I have said on former occasions I know the canal is going to be built. I do not know when. But I do believe the American people, after spending so much money, will go on at all events. I was somewhat surprised to see in the public press that Mr. Stevens, who was the engineer, says the canal will be of no value to the commerce or the country when it is built. I do not agree with that. I do not believe it will be of as much value to the country as people have supposed, but it will be of some value provided, and provided only, it is an effective and useful canal. You may build a canal that will be of no use to commerce because the shipmasters of the world will not use it.

People talk about sending our battle ships through it. If it was built, it would be infinitely safer for the Government of the United States to send its battle ships where it has sent our fleet than to take the chance of putting one of those battle ships in those great locks. A slight movement of one of those battle ships would sweep the whole line of locks off, if it occurred in a top lock. Nobody can imagine what would happen, except to say that it would mean the total destruction of the flight of locks on both sides, where they are in duplicate. Both parts would be torn out from top to bottom by a battle ship.

Mr. President, I hope I shall not speak so often on this subject that I shall be regarded as a bore. But it is a matter of great concern to the American people that they shall get a canal which will meet the demands of the commerce of the world, not only as a measure of profit, but as a measure of honor. We have assumed the authority to build it; we have denied everybody else the right to build it; and it becomes our duty to build such a canal as will meet the demands of the world's shipping.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the joint resolution is one which will affect the industries of the section which I in part represent, and it is to them a matter of very decided importance. It is important, if it is to pass, that it be put in shape where it will not be practically impossible for parties to furnish material for the construction of the canal without, in the effort to do so, incurring risk of loss. I have once or twice before endeavored to point out the practical difficulties in the way. Each time it has happened, unfortunately for me, there was an interruption before I could succeed in presenting them. I shall endeavor to do so now from a practical standpoint.

The two materials which are to be largely furnished from the South in the construction of the canal are lumber and cross-ties. As is suggested to me by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], cement also. That possibly is from Oklahoma. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] also suggests Texas.

Mr. JOHNSTON. And Alabama.

Mr. BACON. The section from which I come, or rather I will say the State which I in part represent, is more interested in lumber and cross-ties for the construction of the canal. The Senators around me can represent the industries from their States which will be thus interested, and doubtless they will do so. I know it is not confined to my State, but includes South Carolina, North Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas, all of which will be interested in the furnishing of lumber and cross-ties, and those materials will be shipped from half a dozen to a dozen different ports.

Mr. ALDRICH. Do I understand that this is one of those questions of the character described by a late Democratic candidate for the Presidency in a notable letter as a "local question?"

Mr. BACON. No; I think not. I am trying to get rid of the burden which this joint resolution——

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought the Senator was discussing it from the standpoint of how it affected his State.

Mr. BACON. I do not want a burden laid upon that industry. I want to have it so that those who are engaged in that industry will be permitted to bid for the furnishing of lumber and cross-ties, and have the information at the time they bid, whether those bids are to be based upon rates of transportation charged by foreign vessels or upon the higher rates of transportation to be charged by American vessels. That is the exact point.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the purpose of the joint resolution is to protect American industries generally——

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. ALDRICH. And not those of any particular State.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is usually very correct as to anything which relates to matters of this kind; but the joint resolution relates exclusively to the matter of transportation. It is simply a joint resolution—I presume the Senator has not read it—which requires that with certain exceptions named or with certain qualifications, all material and equipment for the canal shall be shipped in vessels of American register. That is substantially what it is——

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I supposed.

Mr. BACON. Without going on to speak of the different classes of ships.

The particular point I am after is this. I stated it yesterday, but in order that I may have the connection I will state it again very briefly. In order that one who has lumber and cross-ties or any other material which he wishes to furnish to the canal may make a bid for the furnishing of those materials to be delivered at the Isthmus, it is necessary for him to be able to form a correct estimate as to what will be the cost of transportation, because that must enter very largely into the cost to him of the material when delivered, and he must be able to add to the original cost the cost of transportation in order that he may figure upon a reasonable profit. The point is that there should be as far as possible certainty to enable the producer of lumber and cross-ties to make his calculation as to the price he will bid at which he will deliver the goods at Panama. If he has to pay a high rate of freight he must add a high rate of freight to his bid. If he is to be permitted to have a low rate of freight he must add the low rate of freight to his bid.

Now, the trouble with the joint resolution, even with the amendment proposed, is that one who wishes to make a bid will be in doubt and uncertainty as to whether he has to ship by American vessels or whether he will be permitted to ship by foreign vessels.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is there any competition in cross-ties from Mexico or Honduras or any other country?

Mr. BACON. We are not discussing that question now.

Mr. ALDRICH. It seems to me important to look at both sides of this question.

Mr. BACON. Two years ago we passed a law which required this material to be taken from the United States.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my recollection.

Mr. BACON. That is not the question now before us.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I had something to do with that measure.

Mr. BACON. Yes; the Senator did.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not know but that the Senator would like to have that changed, so that we could have foreign competition.

Mr. BACON. Yes; I should like it, and I shall have something to say about that before I get through.

Mr. ALDRICH. If we are to have foreign competition in transportation, why not in materials?

Mr. BACON. I will discuss that if I do not occupy too much of the time of the Senate. I am now on the question of transportation. I will come to the question whether or not the canal should be built with material wherever we can get it cheapest or whether it should be built under such conditions that an increased price is to be paid. But I am not on that question now. We had that question two years ago. It is a cognate question, it is true, but it is not the one before us now. The one before us now is transportation, and I have endeavored to point out the fact that the joint resolution should be made so certain that a man who wishes to bid can with accuracy tell how much to the original cost of the material he must add for transportation. If it were certain that there were going to be American ships at each of the ports from which this material is to be shipped, of course there would be no difficulty in the party who desires to make the bid adding the necessary amount to the cost of the material, so that he could make his bid advisedly and have the assurance of a reasonable profit in the price which he was to receive from the Government. But if it is uncertain whether or not he is to have a high cost of transportation or a low cost of transportation he can not possibly bid without danger of loss.

Now, the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], and which I understand has been agreed to by the committee, is one which says that this restriction as to American vessels shall not be enforced—this is substantially what it is, I understand—unless American vessels are available. Am I correct as to the substantial meaning of it? I do not pretend to quote the exact words.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Substantially.

Mr. BACON. Now, it will be understood that in practical operation an advertisement is put in the papers that at a certain time bids will be received for various articles, and I will illustrate it by lumber and cross-ties, although there are many other articles. An advertisement is put in that bids will be received for lumber and cross-ties to be furnished at a certain time, probably months ahead, necessarily months ahead. The owner of the lumber is desirous to make his calculation as to what bid he shall put in. He is to ship from the port of Savannah or the port of Brunswick. It is to be four months from the time of the bid up to the time when the contract is to be carried out by him or when he is to start his cargo from Savannah or from Brunswick for shipment to the canal.

How can he tell when he makes that bid whether there are going to be vessels available or not? How can he tell when he makes that bid whether he is to make it upon the basis of the cheap rate of a foreign vessel or upon the basis of the high rate of a domestic or American vessel? It is to meet that condition of affairs that I ask for the adoption of an amendment which will permit the bids to be made in the alternative.

I want to say, however, one word in response to the question propounded to me by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] as to the practical operation of the joint resolution as it is now before the Senate. The Senator asked me yesterday the question whether there was not more or less of risk and uncertainty in all business transactions and whether or not all shippers, when they made contracts which involved transportation as a part of the bid, did not have to bow to this uncertainty, and I was proceeding to answer him at the time when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived and the debate was necessarily suspended.

The reason is this. I illustrate it again by the simple matter of lumber, although there are many other articles, of course, which would be interested in this line of business. When an American makes a contract to deliver lumber in South America or in Spain, or in any European port—and a great many of these contracts are made for the delivery of lumber under the circumstances which I have named, and yellow pine is shipped to all of them—he knows he is to pay the freight that is charged by a foreign vessel, because there are no American vessels running from South Atlantic ports to those ports. He knows as a certainty that the rate of freight that he is to include in his estimate is the rate of freight of the foreign vessel, and while those rates vary in some small degree they are so reasonably regular that there is no difficulty in the lumber merchant making his estimate and including in it the cost of transportation to the foreign port.

On the other hand, if lumber is to be shipped from Savannah or Brunswick to a port of the United States, as is done every day to Philadelphia, or Boston, or New York, or to Maine—if such a thing as lumber is shipped to Maine—the shipper knows that he must send it by a ship under American registry, because a foreign ship is not permitted to carry freight between those ports in the United States; so there is no hesitation and no doubt. In the one case it is absolutely certain that the freight is going to be the freight of a vessel under foreign registry at a cheap rate. In the other case it is an absolute certainty that it must be a ship under American registry, at a high rate, which is also so reasonably regular that the shipper can without difficulty estimate what would be the increased cost to the original cost of the material.

But when it comes to the shipment to Panama, under this bill, unless he is permitted to put in an alternative bid—so much in case it is shipped by a foreign vessel and so much, on the other hand, if shipped by an American vessel—it is an absolute impossibility for the shipper of lumber to make his estimate with any degree of certainty as to whether, if he gets the price he asks for it, he may not incur great loss as a consequence thereof. I do not see how there can be any escape from that proposition.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. BACON. It all rests at last, if the Senator will pardon me until I finish the sentence, under the bill, in the discretion of the President. Of course we know that means the discretion of the Department, necessarily so and properly so. The President is the proper officer to be named, though the work must necessarily be done by the departmental officer, and being in his discretion, it is an impossibility in advance for the shipper or the bidder to know whether his discretion is going to be exercised in favor of the American vessel or the foreign vessel. It is an impossibility for him to know what the President or his subordinate may consider to be reasonable or unreasonable, and he will have to go at a guess and move at a venture.

Now, I will with pleasure yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I think, as I intimated yesterday, the Senator is seeking to make by statute a provision that shall cover all the vicissitudes and chances of trade. The situation depicted by the Senator of his constituents producing lumber and ties is not confined to his locality, and he said, which admits the difficulty in providing for specific articles, that there are other articles beside lumber and ties affected by this uncertainty.

In my own neighborhood in the State of Maine we are largely interested in the shipping of lumber and railroad ties and sleepers to foreign ports, to Panama, and wherever the product can be sold. It is an everyday occurrence in Maine that a contract is made in April, May, or March for the shipping of these products to foreign countries months afterwards. The shipper does not know what he will have to pay when the time comes around. The rates of freight in the fall are sometimes very greatly larger than they are in the spring, and the shipper takes that chance. You can not cure, as I have said, all the vicissitudes of trade by provisions of law, and when the Senator seeks to make an exception here for lumber and ties——

Mr. BACON. No; I do not seek anything of the kind.

Mr. HALE. He invokes——

Mr. BACON. I used that for an illustration. It will apply to any material.

Mr. HALE. Is the Senator's proposition general or does it apply to lumber?

Mr. BACON. Certainly, it is general.

Mr. HALE. It is general?

Mr. BACON. Of course.

Mr. HALE. Applying to all products?

Mr. BACON. To all material.

Mr. HALE. Of every kind?

Mr. BACON. Of every kind. Of course it is. I will ask that the amendment may be read.

Mr. HALE. No; I will take the Senator's word. I have not read it.

Mr. BACON. I did not suppose for a moment that the Senator or anyone else would presume that I would ask that a particular class of products should have a different rule from any other class of products.

Mr. HALE. The Senator had talked about this one product.

Mr. BACON. I used it as an illustration, and I said that those two materials I had a special interest in.

Mr. HALE. The Senator had talked about that and I supposed he was confining his amendment to it.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will let it be read, and then if the Senator has a question to ask me I would be delighted to answer it. But if the Senator desires to answer my argument I hope he will let me complete it first.

Mr. HALE. No; so far as the point that I make is of any force, you can not provide by law what a shipper will have to pay some weeks or some months ahead, and that is just as pertinent and just as strong a consideration before us as whether the Senator's amendment applies generally or only to lumber and ties.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the amendment be read.

Mr. HALE. We must take some chances in trade.

Mr. BACON. I wish to say that I wrote the amendment as a proviso, but some Senators have suggested that instead of being put in as a proviso it ought to be put in as an independent section, which is agreeable to me.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That in every such contract the party or parties, bidding on the same shall be authorized to submit bids to deliver said material and equipment, in the alternative, either—

First. On docks within reach of the ship's tackle at seaports of the United States named by the bidder.

Second. On docks, at the option of the bidder, at Colon or La Boca (1) in ships of American register; (2) in ships of foreign register.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say that that amendment, proposed by me, is copied with a very slight variation from the order of the Secretary of War under which bids are now made, and while, if the Secretary of War should continue that order, there would be no necessity for this amendment, the amendment is offered out of abundance of caution to prevent any change in that particular. I hope I may have the attention of the Senator from Maine. The order of the Secretary of War uses the word "steamships." I have changed that to "ships," because we have a number of sailing vessels, some of which come down from the country of the Senator from Maine—schooners—sailing vessels that land on our coast and carry freight largely. The three-masted schooner is now one of the most popular vessels on the coast. With the exception of changing the word "steamships" to "ships" it is a copy of the order which the Secretary of War has himself issued on the subject.

I do not know whether the Senator heard the remark which I made, as the two Senators from Maine were talking. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] referred the other day, when we first had this matter up for discussion, to the order of the Secretary of War in which these alternative bids are permitted. I asked that it be read in order that I might get the language, and it was put in the RECORD. I have taken it from that order with the simple change of the word "steamships" to "ships." With that change in the order, as I said, a great many three-masted schooners which come down from Maine to our country, may be allowed to engage in this trade.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FRYE. If this bill should become a law, would not the Commission or whoever had the authority necessarily make the bids in the alternative, in order to compare the difference in cost between one and the other, and to determine whether the American bid, for instance, was unreasonable?

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether it would be made in the alternative or not; and if the Senator is certain that it would be, why should he object to its being incorporated in the law?

Mr. FRYE. I have not yet objected. I am making up my mind.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will not object.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, I think this proposition, which I had never read and I did not know what was in it until it was read from the desk, is a very different proposition from what I supposed the Senator was arguing.

Mr. BACON. I knew the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. HALE. As to lumber and ties, I think it is interfering rather too much with taking the chances of trade, but still I do not see how it can do much harm, because, as my colleague said, the alternative must be considered in reaching a decision as to whether the rate is reasonable or not.

Mr. BACON. It can not do any harm, and it may do a great deal of good. There is an estimated difference, I understand, of some 30 or 33 per cent between the cost of carriage by a ship under American registry and the cost of carriage by a ship under foreign registry. I do not know personally about that, but that is what I am told. If so, the danger of any complication growing out of that difference ought to be minimized as much as possible.

Mr. HALE. As my colleague has said, I do not see—and I am trying to look at it in a practical way—how the deciding power—we call it the President; it will be the Commission—can get at whether the difference is unreasonable or extortionate in the price demanded until they have an alternative bid. So I do not think the Senator's proposition does much harm.

Mr. BACON. I am glad the Senator concedes that much. I think it will do a great deal of good. I do not want it in the bill as a spineless measure, without any energy or force. I think it is important to have it. A man sits down six months or four months before the time when he is to furnish the material to make his calculation as to what bid he can safely make for himself, and it ought not to rest in the uncertainty and discretion of some other person as to whether he shall be required to arbitrarily send it by an American vessel as against a foreign vessel unless he is put in a position where, if such a requirement is made of him, his bid will be certain as to the one and as to the other.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow the amendment to be read once more?

Mr. BACON. I will, with pleasure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That in every such contract the party or parties bidding on the same shall be authorized to submit bids to deliver said material and equipment in the alternative, either—

First. On docks within reach of the ship's tackle at seaports of the United States named by the bidder.

Second. On docks, at the option of the bidder, at Colon or La Boca (1) in ships of American register; (2) in ships of foreign register.

Mr. BACON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, he will notice there are two distinct propositions there. One is that the party is going to deliver not on the Isthmus, but at the port to be named by him within reach of the ship's tackle.

Mr. HALE. That is a very different transaction.

Mr. BACON. Of course, I wish all the contracts were that way. Then all this trouble would be avoided and the Government itself would determine in what shape it would carry the products or material to the Isthmus. While the alternative is divided into two, it relates simply to two different coasts. One is on the Atlantic side and the other is on the Pacific side; but, in fact, there are but two classes of bids to be made. One is a bid for delivery on the dock within the ship's tackle at a port to be named in this country, and the other is on the dock at Panama, either on the Atlantic side or the Pacific side.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. If I will accept that amendment, will the Senator allow a vote to be taken on the joint resolution?

Mr. BACON. The vote will certainly be taken this afternoon.

I will not occupy very much time of the Senate after that. I will say, however, that I will be glad to strike out the word "Provided" and make it an independent section. Some Senators thought possibly if the word "Provided" were in, it might have some relation to other provisions which would not be desired.

Mr. FRYE. I think a separate section is the better way.

Mr. BACON. Very well. If the Senator will prefer that I will have no more to say on that subject and, to that extent, the Senator will get closer to his vote, and I will say nothing more about it.

I want to say one word, however, Mr. President, because the Senators on the other side have asked me on a former occasion, and the Senator from Rhode Island to-day, something as to this general policy. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said something to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] indicating the idea that the Senator from South Carolina, and possibly those who were associated with him on this side of the Chamber, had voted for the bill which was passed two years ago, which required that all material furnished for the construction of the canal should be bought within the United States, and some little question arose as to whether or not those of us on this side did support that measure.

Mr. TELLER. I did.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Colorado says that he did for one. That is true. I have examined the vote, and he is the only Senator on this side of the Chamber who did vote for it; the Senator, I have no doubt, being influenced by the very best of motives and voting according to his conviction as to what he should do.

Mr. TELLER. I stated it.

Mr. BACON. Yes; the Senator stated it. As I stated a few days ago that was my recollection, the question the other day having been raised as to whether or not I had voted for it upon that occasion. As I stated the other day, I not only voted against it, but spoke against it. I took the position then which I take now, that, regardless of the question whether a man believes in protection or not and whether he advocates and maintains the policy of protection as the proper policy of this country, it was not a subject where that principle should be invoked or where it should be applied; that here was a great enterprise, an enterprise which required not only a tremendous expenditure, but a tremendous sacrifice on the part of the people of the United States; that it was not an enterprise for money or for gain, but a great world-wide enterprise in which all the nations of the earth were to have equal advantage and equal benefit with ourselves, in which we had solemnly stipulated to the world in our treaty with Great Britain on the subject that there should be no discrimination in favor of the people of the United States, but that that canal should be free to the world upon equal terms with ourselves.

I took the position two years ago, and I repeat it now, that whatever a man may think about protection, concede, if you please, the correctness of the principle, both as a principle and as a practice, the construction of the Panama Canal was not an occasion where one dollar should be taken from the people of the United States for its construction more than was absolutely necessary for its construction.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FULTON. Does not the Senator think that we are taking less from the people of the United States than we would otherwise take, by providing that they shall have the preference in furnishing the material?

Mr. BACON. I do not think so.

Mr. FULTON. In paying them for the material rather than paying citizens of foreign nations makes it cost the people of the United States less than it otherwise would. The Senator will see——

Mr. BACON. The Senator asks me a question and then discusses it afterwards. Having asked the question will he please let me reply to it?

Mr. FULTON. Very well.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not think so at all. If, of course, every particle of the material was furnished uniformly by all the people of the United States, then you might say that it was taking it out of one pocket and putting it in another. But the Senator well knows, and every Senator knows, that that is not the fact; that the great body of the people do not and can not participate in whatever benefit may come to those who sell this material. In that debate, Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. If the Senator will allow me right there——

Mr. BACON. I will yield as soon as the Senator will let me answer his question. What I am now saying is in reply to a question, and he must let me finish, please.

Mr. FULTON. Of course, if the Senator insists I will have to yield.

Mr. BACON. I will answer another question from the Senator after I answer this one.

The debate on that question brought prominently to the attention of the Senate the fact that upon the mere subject of the purchase of two dredges—one of them for the Pacific side and the other for the Atlantic side—bids had been invoked and had been received by the United States Government—one from an American manufacturer and the other from a Scotch manufacturer—in which, after the most careful investigation by the Secretary of War and with the aid of the opinions of those officers engaged with him in the prosecution of the work who had investigated it, there was estimated to be a loss to the United States of $70,000 in accepting the American bid. Calculating every element of cost, transportation, marine insurance, and everything else, there was $70,000 difference. In the debate which proceeded thereon, I find by reference to the RECORD, which I have examined to-day and which is upon my desk, that I stated the fact that, upon investigation by parties whose familiarity with the matter led me to confide in the correctness of their judgment, upon an estimate of $250,000,000 as the cost of the Panama Canal, the purchase of the material in the United States would make the Panama Canal cost $32,000,000 more than it would if the purchases were made wherever the material could be obtained cheapest. That was upon a basis of cost of $247,000,000 for the canal, if I recollect correctly, and nobody now thinks the canal is going to be built for any such sum as that; and in proportion as the cost of the canal is increased, in the same proportion is going to be increased the additional cost to the people of the United States of the construction of the canal, by reason of the fact that the material has to be bought in this country and can not be bought where it can be had cheapest.

The joint resolution which is now before us, and which we all know is to pass, is to add still more to the unnecessary cost of this gigantic work to the people of the United States. I do not know how much it will add, because I am not familiar with the proportion of the cost of transportation to the original cost of the material, but if it is a very small amount, with the increased cost of the canal and the consequently increased cost of material, and added to that the increased cost of transportation, I have no doubt but that the canal is to cost fifty or sixty million dollars, at least, more than it would otherwise cost if those who are to construct it were permitted to buy the material in the cheapest market and to ship it at the cheapest rate of ocean freight.

This increased cost must be paid by the entire American people. The money for this purpose will not drop from the skies. It must come out of the pockets of all the people without distinction. There is not a man who toils in the field, or works with his hand or brain in any occupation in the United States, who will not be required to contribute his part to pay this unnecessary and extra cost of building the canal.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia allow me to make a suggestion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to know whether or not the principal cost of the canal will not be labor?

Mr. BACON. I am coming to that, if the Senator will permit me. I know exactly what he was going to ask me.

Mr. TILLMAN. The point is this: That if we are going to confine this Government in its expenditures for material to the home market absolutely, then——

Mr. BACON. Why not apply the same principle to labor?

Mr. TILLMAN. Why not have American laborers, of whom there are so many hundreds of thousands now roaming up and down hunting for soup kitchens?

Mr. BACON. I will say that the Senator from South Carolina has simply anticipated exactly what I was coming to right at the very minute.

I ask Senators on the other side, if the home market is to be protected, if home interests are to be those which are to control, why is it, when material is to be bought at higher prices in the United States and is to be shipped at higher prices than it can be gotten for elsewhere, that labor, of all things, while it is protected in this country, should not be protected there by those who have control and who dispose of such matters?

Mr. HALE. I suppose the simplest answer——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I suppose the simplest and most straightforward answer is that you can not get sufficient American labor to go there to do the work, but that you can get an ample supply of American material to be employed in the construction of the canal.

Mr. BACON. And American ships. Did I understand the Senator to say "American ships?"

Mr. HALE. That remains to be seen.

Mr. BACON. But the Senator when it came to labor——

Mr. HALE. We are talking about material.

Mr. BACON. We are talking about material; we are talking about transportation; we are talking about labor—all three of them.

Mr. HALE. What the Senator meant just now and what was raised by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] was the question of material.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. HALE. The answer to the question is simply that you can get American material and plenty of it, but you can not get American labor. American laborers will not go there.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. One second. Let me show the inconsistency of the Senator from Maine and those whom he represents. There is no greater urgency on the part of the Senator from Maine in the case of material than there is in the case of the shipping. The matter before us to-day is a matter of shipping, and I asked the Senator to see if he would follow me out and complete his own sentence when he said there was plenty of material—whether he would say that there is plenty of shipping, because if there was plenty of shipping, it would not be necessary to frame this joint resolution with any qualifying clause in it.

Mr. HALE. I would certainly utilize American shipping so far as I could get it.

Mr. BACON. Exactly.

Mr. HALE. I certainly would.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. HALE. I would give it a preference, and a large preference.

Mr. BACON. The point as to which I ask the Senator is this: It is assumed that there would be no sufficiency of American labor without any effort to procure it, with an absolute repudiation in the very beginning of the effort of those who were interested in American labor to have it laid down as a rule that American labor should construct the canal.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I tried to answer the Senator's question by a very few words. Now, let me ask the Senator whether he believes that American labor—labor in the United States, such as it is—could be obtained to go down and do the work under the conditions that at present obtain and will always obtain on the Isthmus of Panama?

Mr. BACON. I will only say this to the Senator——

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator think as to that?

Mr. BACON. I will say this to the Senator: That there is scarcely a week passes, possibly scarcely two days pass, that I do not get letters from men in my part of the country seeking positions on that canal.

Mr. HALE. Not from laborers?

Mr. BACON. Yes; from laborers. Men who have to work—mechanics who have to labor.

Mr. HALE. I can tell the Senator——

Mr. BACON. And I have not a doubt in the world that there are all along the southern tier of States in the United States an abundance of laborers who can be induced to go there.

Mr. HALE. I should doubt that very much.

Mr. BACON. Very well. The effort should at least have been made, and none was made. We know it is a fact that the labor organizations in this country appealed to those in authority to make that restriction, and that it was refused.

Mr. HALE. But they did not agree to furnish the labor and never would furnish the labor.

Mr. BACON. You did not try it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me right there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. It appears that, so far as the cost goes, it is left entirely to competition in the United States, and we are compelled to pay whatever price is charged. Now, if you put the same restriction on labor and say that we shall employ none but American labor, and a price is fixed, first, at a dollar, and if that does not bring them, go to $2, and if that does not bring them, go to $3, and if $3 does not bring them, then go to four, five, six, or ten dollars—just simply say that you will pay whatever is necessary and you will get them.

Mr. BACON. And that is what you say as to the material; that is what you say as to transportation—that, regardless of whether it will cost more or less, you shall use domestic material and you shall use ships of domestic register.

Mr. HALE. This joint resolution does not provide that.

Mr. BACON. The joint resolution adopted two years ago did as to material.

Mr. HALE. This joint resolution does not provide that as to transportation any amount shall be charged. If there is an improper discrimination——

Mr. TILLMAN. But, if the Senator will permit me, the law compels us to use American material regardless of the cost. Now, if we say that we shall use nothing but American labor regardless of cost, we can get that, too.

Mr. FULTON. We know we can get material.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I yield to a question, but not to debate.

Mr. FULTON. Very well.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Oregon desires to ask me a question, I will yield to him with pleasure.

Mr. FULTON. I want to ask a question.

Mr. BACON. But if the Senator wishes to make an answer, I prefer that he should answer in his own time.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to ask the Senator a question, and I will have to premise it with a very brief statement of what the Senator has said. The Senator says that we have declined to extend the same protection to labor that we do to material.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] answered that by saying that the labor market in this country will not supply the demand; but the Senator now is contending that he would protect the labor market in this country, and he proposes that all the vast supplies necessary for the construction of the Panama Canal shall be purchased in foreign markets.

Mr. BACON. Purchased in the open market.

Mr. FULTON. Very well. The Senator admits that it would come from the foreign market because we would save $32,000,000 in that way.

Mr. BACON. A large part of that amount.

Mr. FULTON. But does not the Senator realize that by such a policy he would be doing labor a greater wrong and a greater injury than could possibly be done it by shutting it out of the labor market in Panama? What would be the effect on the laborers in the factories, the mills, and the forests of this country if we should always buy the vast amount of supplies required by the Government in other countries?

Mr. BACON. The vast amount of supplies that we have to buy, while it is a very vast amount and while in the aggregate the increased cost is very great to the American people, is but a drop in the bucket compared to the work that the American laborers do in the production of things in our own country for our own consumption and the influence upon our general production is insignificant. The point that I intend to make in the beginning was that however correct the principle of protection may be—and that is what the Senator now alludes to—it has no application to this case.

Mr. FULTON. Will the Senator allow me right there to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I yield if the Senator wants to ask a question, but I do object to debate. If the Senator desires to answer me, I want him to answer in his own time.

Mr. FULTON. There is no time as good as right now.

Mr. BACON. The Senator can ask a question, but I shall decline to yield for more than that, because I desire to go on with some connected presentation of the matter.

Mr. FULTON. This is a question.

Mr. BACON. Well.

Mr. FULTON. Now, the Senator must admit this——

Mr. BACON. That is not a question.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator—protection being the policy of the country—if there is not a good reason for requiring the Government to purchase its supplies in the home market, in the protected market? If the Government requires the individual in this country to purchase his supplies in a protected market, should not the Government be required to purchase its supplies in the same market?

Mr. BACON. That might be true, Mr. President, as to material which the Government intended to use in this country in its ordinary operations, but I have endeavored to differentiate. This is a different matter altogether.

Right in that connection I want to call the attention of the Senate—I say the Senate in order that I may not arouse my learned and distinguished friend to rejoinder immediately—to the fact that that is not the policy that we pursue as to other matters. I have before me here a letter which was written by the Secretary of War to the President of the United States on this very question—and this letter was read in a former debate here two years ago—in which the Secretary of War called the attention of the President of the United States to the fact that we did not pursue that policy as to material necessary for the support of the Army in the Philippines; that, while all the material and supplies could be purchased in this country, that was disregarded in the purchase of supplies for the support of the Army in the Philippines, and materials and supplies were purchased wherever they could be obtained cheapest. Right in that connection, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate——

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if it would not be different in the case of war?

Mr. BACON. This was not war. I am not speaking of war.

Mr. FULTON. That might necessitate a different rule.

Mr. BACON. I am speaking of a time of peace. There is peace in the Philippines now, and there was two years ago when the letter was written. I had no reference to a time of war. But I want to call the attention of the Senate right in connection with the question as to the purchase of material and supplies by the Government to the fact that when this matter was before the Senate two years ago I offered an amendment, which I will read. It was an amendment to the bill, which provided that all of the supplies and all of the material for the construction and equipment of the Panama Canal should be purchased in the United States. I offered this amendment:

Provided, That in making said purchases a larger price shall not be paid for any such article of domestic production or manufacture than the price at which the same or similar articles of domestic production or manufacture are sold or offered for sale in foreign markets or for export to foreign markets.

Does anybody contend that the Government of the United States ought to be made to pay to producers of the United States, the manufacturers of the United States, for material which is to be used in the construction of the Panama Canal a greater price than the same parties sell to foreign governments? And yet that amendment was voted down—all the Democrats with one exception voting for it, and all the Republicans voting against it—and to-day it is a fact that the very people that you say should be so protected are selling to the people in foreign countries articles at one price and asking and receiving from the Government of the United States a higher price for the same articles to go into the construction of the Panama Canal.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. FULTON. Does not the Senator from Georgia realize the fact that in selling goods manufactured in this country at a lower price the transaction is oftentimes—more frequently than otherwise—influenced by the fact that the material which is used in manufacturing that article, the raw material, is imported from a foreign country, and then a drawback is paid when it is shipped out? Consequently in many cases it may be that they can afford to sell in the foreign market cheaper because they get that rebate of duty on the imported raw material.

Mr. BACON. The Senator now wants to go into a discussion of the question of the sale of goods in foreign markets at lower prices than they are sold in this market. That would take a very wide range and would occupy much longer time than the Senator from Maine would be content that I should occupy.

Mr. FRYE. A much wider range than the present discussion has taken?

Mr. BACON. Yes; a very much wider one.

Mr. FULTON. I will say, Mr. President, that if the Senator is desirous to accommodate the Senator from Maine and close the discussion, I will join with him.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator is his own judge. He can answer to his own heart's content and at as great a length as he wishes after I conclude; but I will say that the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon as to the reasons why articles are sold in foreign markets at a cheaper rate than they are sold in our own country does not in anywise apply to the question whether the Government of the United States should be required to pay to those same manufacturers a greater price than those manufacturers sell in foreign markets.

Mr. FULTON. I did not say that was the only reason.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no. We have had that matter discussed in the Senate enough to know that there are a great many reasons, and it would take a very long time to state them.

Now, Mr. President, in order that I may not weary the Senator from Maine by occupying too much of his time, I am going to call attention to one or two things which are a little pertinent here.

I said that whatever might be the correctness of the principle of protection, it ought not to be applied in this case; that, in my opinion, the reward, if you please, or the fruits that the producers, the manufacturers, in this country reap from the present tariff law are sufficient without their grasping for more; and, as an evidence of that, I am going to read something that a Republican said. On the 3d day of February, 1908, there appeared in the Washington Herald a series of interviews with a number of manufacturers who were here at the time when the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] was to make his heralded speech on the subject of a tariff commission. Those manufacturers were here in the interest of the appointment of such a commission and in the interest of a revision of the tariff. I will read what one of those manufacturers, who said he was a Republican, said on that subject. After several other interviews with other parties the article in the Herald goes on to say:

Even more outspoken than Mr. Van Cleave is Mr. H. E. Miles, chairman of the tariff committee of the Manufacturers' Association and president of the National Association of Agricultural Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers.

I hope I may have the attention of Senators to the words of this Republican manufacturer who was here upon that business. I repeat these are the words of Mr. H. E. Miles, chairman of the tariff committee of the Manufacturers' Association and president of the National Association of Agricultural Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers. He further says this:

The annual output of the manufacturers of the United States, as shown in the last census, is valued at $14,800,000,000. The tariff which covers the prices is inexact, antiquated, and inapplicable at the present time. Scarcely a single schedule has any honest and direct application at this time to the principle of protection. Under present conditions the tariff is not a protective tariff in any sense.

I hope Senators will listen to this language:

Under present conditions the tariff is not a protective tariff in any sense. It is a tariff of graft and discrimination, hurtful in a thousand ways.

From one-half to two-thirds of the stuff made under this tariff bears to the consumer an unjust and unreasonable price because of the tariff.

Now listen to these words:

It is estimated by competent authorities that the graft, overcharge, and wrong done the American public because of the present tariff reaches $3,000,000 a working day.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. From what Democratic stump speech is the Senator reading?

Mr. BACON. Let me finish it and then I will answer the Senator's question. I will repeat the last sentence for fear the Senator from Rhode Island did not hear it. I hope he will listen to me. I want the Senator from Rhode Island to hear this:

It is estimated by competent authorities that the graft, overcharge, and wrong done the American public because of the present tariff reaches $3,000,000 a working day. We have the facts, schedule by schedule, and are prepared to make the details public should we receive opposition to our demand for a permanent tariff commission, through the appointment of which a proper adjustment of the tariff can be procured.

We are not agitators or reformers. We are mostly Republicans, and all protectionists.

That is the kind of a Democratic stump speech it is. It is from Mr. H. E. Miles. The Senator will pardon me. I will read it over again, as he did not seem to hear it.

Mr. ALDRICH and others. No, no.

Mr. BACON. I am simply going to read his name and designation. I am not going to read his interview over again. I know it is very unpleasant to Senators to hear, and I will not be cruel enough to again impose upon them by reading it to them twice. But I must again tell you who Mr. Miles is. Mr. Miles is the chairman of the tariff committee of the Manufacturers' Association and president of the National Association of Agricultural Implement and Vehicle Manufacturers, and he says he is a Republican and a protectionist.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The only doubt I had about whether it was a Democratic speech or not was the mildness of the statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. The mildness of the statement! Well, Mr. President, if this is mild, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] suggests to me, what would it be if it were more extreme?

But, leaving all jesting aside, is not that enough to give every man pause? Three million dollars of graft and overcharge and wrong done to the American public every working day by the present tariff law! It rises up a good deal higher than the question whether or not they have enough of remuneration, to put a very mild term upon it—I will not use the offensive term—as an effect of the operation of the tariff. Have they not a sufficiency without saying to the American people, "You must make this canal cost $60,000,000 more than it otherwise would in order that we may have more graft on the same lines?"

Mr. President, I saw a very interesting statement in a newspaper yesterday—the Washington Post, I think it was—as to the legislation that the President intended that Congress shall enact before it adjourns. It is true this is not issued by the President, but it is issued by someone who states it as a fact. I have waited a day, because I know that if it were not a fact, and if it were not recognized by the President as true, he would be swift in its denial with the shortest of all English words to mark the line of division between him and the one who had misrepresented him. These are the great subjects that the President orders that we are to legislate upon before Congress adjourns prior to the meeting of the Republican national convention:

An emergency currency—and, by the way, that seems to be assured, because I see it stated in the newspapers that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has been in close conference with the President, and as a result, I suppose, of that conference, I saw in yesterday's Washington Herald, I think it was, a cartoon in which the President is represented with a big stick and an extinguisher, under which he had some dozen Senators. You could only see their feet, and consequently I can not say who they were, but the President was a Brobdingnag and they were Lilliputians. As the Senator from Rhode Island now has not simply the active cooperation, but the active coertion, if the cartoonist may be believed, of the President of the United States, there can be no doubt about the fact that the currency bill is to pass. But I am trying to read about the number of things which you Senators have got to attend to before you leave here whether you will or no, and I just want to call attention to the fact that the revision of the tariff, unfortunately, is not among them, although every day it is taking in graft and overcharge $3,000,000 from the American people. Here they are:

Emergency currency.
Employers' liability.
Abuse of injunctions in labor cases.
Strengthening of laws regulating labor conditions.
Increase of Federal power over railroads.
Authorization of railroads to form traffic associations.
Modification of the Sherman antitrust law.
Elimination of bucket shops and gambling in stocks and commodities.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator think that we are going to have another message ordering our brethren over there to do those things?

Mr. BACON. The newspaper says that a message is to come. I do not know whether the fact that that has been published will prevent its coming or not, but that is certainly what we have every reason to believe is correct, for the reason, as I have already said, that if it were not correct, one day having passed, we should have had a denial of it in no uncertain terms.

Nothing is said about Brownsville, as Senators around me suggest, but the order had already been issued in regard to that, and I presume will be obeyed.

Now, Mr. President, I would have very grave doubt as to the ability of even the very able and distinguished and large majority on the other side of this Chamber, as well as of the House of Representatives, to successfully deal with so large a number of subjects and to successfully enact them into law before the end of the present session, if it were not that I have from either to-day's or yesterday's Washington Post, I believe, another article, which shows the new régime, the new methods through which the Government of the United States proposes hereafter to swiftly enact legislation. Our very short-sighted forefathers, in framing the Constitution, supposed that they had correctly laid down the framework of this Government when they set up the President and gave him a very short command, to wit: That he should see to the execution of the laws; and when they, in an enumeration of the powers, conferred upon the two branches of Congress all the legislative power, and when they went further and marked out the line of division so that there should never be the transgression by one into the field of the other.

But that seems to be all changed; and I see by a statement which came out in the Washington Post this morning, the correctness of which we can not doubt, because it has gotten so that no man would dare to publish anything in the newspapers and attribute it to the President of the United States unless it were true, and scarcely then, because he would be liable to be met by a denial which he could not himself stand up against—but here, Mr. President, is the statement of a law which has been framed for enactment by Congress. It is with reference to that that I say I have been encouraged to believe that whether I favor all these measures or not, the great majority of the two Houses would be able to cope with them in a very short time because of the great assistance and guidance they get in the consideration and construction and preparation of these laws and in the direction as to the passage thereof.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a historical question?

Mr. BACON. I am not sure I can answer it. I may have to refer to the Senator from Massachusetts. But I will do my best.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is there a campaign going on now in Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I do not think there is, and I do not see much prospect of any.

Here is what the Washington Post published this morning of the preparation of a law which we are informed is soon to be passed. It is not simply to be introduced, but the command has gone forth that it is to be passed. Even the Representative who is to introduce it is designated. It is already arranged for. I will read it:

In pursuance of the recommendation made to Congress by the President in his last annual message, and also in the special message which he transmitted to that body several weeks ago, a bill will be introduced in the House by Chairman HEPBURN, of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, providing for radical modifications of the Sherman antitrust law. This measure is now being drawn up, and its general provisions have been determined upon—at a series of conferences held at the White House, at which were represented the Government and the various interests affected. The concluding session was held last night.

Representing the Administration were the President, Secretary of State Root, Attorney-General Bonaparte, Secretary of Interior Garfield, and Commissioner of Corporations Smith; Victor Morawetz, general solicitor of the Santa Fe Railroad, and F. L. Stetson, one of the counsel for J. P. Morgan & Co., the New York bankers, were there in the interest of the railroads and industrial and financial combinations; President Samuel Gompers, of the American Federation of Labor, was present for organized labor, and former Mayor Seth Low, of New York, represented the Civic Federation, which has been active in harmonizing the relations between capital and labor.

At former conferences there were present men prominent in the business and financial world, such as E. H. Gary, the dominating factor in the steel trust; George W. Perkins, a partner of J. P. Morgan, and others.

I hope Senators will carefully mark the fact that as the culmination of a series of conferences, when the final features of the bill were determined upon, when its limitations were marked out, and when even the gentleman who was to introduce it into another House was selected, in all the enumeration of those who were present, there is not a single Senator or Representative—not a single Senator or Representative in a series of consultations as to a law to be passed by Congress. Does any Senator doubt the correctness of that statement? Is there any Senator who has in his heart an instant of hesitation in the belief of the correctness of it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the Senator from Georgia prepared to express regrets that he was not invited?

Mr. BACON. If I were, the regrets would be in vain, because I am never invited and I never expect to be. I have no right to expect to be. But I do say this: The Senator from Rhode Island had a right to expect to be invited, and the two Senators from Maine and every other Senator on the other side of the Chamber had a right to expect to be invited, even if those of my heretical political faith were excluded.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. Are we to understand from the statement the Senator from Georgia has made, that every Senator on this side had a right to expect to be invited to such a conference, that, in his opinion, legislation should be framed in the White House in the manner suggested in the article rather than in the halls of Congress by the men elected to legislate for the country?

Mr. BACON. I accept the reproof, a proper reproof, which the Senator from Ohio gives me, and I can only excuse myself by the fact that this usurpation—because that is the smallest word that will apply to it—the assumption and the usurpation of the right of the executive department to dictate legislation has been going on not only so unblushingly, but so boastingly, that we have become accustomed to it, and even one like myself, indignant beyond the expression of words that such should be the fact, was betrayed into the error from which the Senator from Ohio so correctly calls me back to the proper limitations.

Mr. President, it is not simply in the framing of law. It is in the dictation of law; and it is not simply there. Senators will pardon me if I say it. I recollect some months ago reciting in this Chamber a little experience I had had in which I had seen the passage of laws in the halls of the congress of another government, where there never had been a vote in the negative in the several visits I made to that hall and never a word said in debate, and where, as an explanation to me, a member of that house had said that there was nothing to debate about and nothing to vote against, because the laws had been sent to them by the President. Mr. President, I do not believe what I am going to tell now—at least I trust it is not yet true—but nevertheless it is the truth that I heard it, that in speaking along this line and expressing wonder that legislators in the American Congress would submit to such usurpation as we have witnessed, it was said to me by a Member of this Senate that there was a power—I will not say what it was—that could defeat any Senator or any Representative of his reelection. I want to say in this connection that in that same country where I saw laws passed without a word and without a negative vote it is true the chief executive officer of the country designates who shall come to congress and who shall not come to congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is that Mexico?

Mr. BACON. I decline to answer the question, because it would not be proper for me to answer it. I will not specify the country. But there is such a country, and I myself have been there and seen it and heard these things which I now narrate.

Mr. President, that is the fate which awaits us if we are to progress along present lines. That is the fate which awaits the American people if it be true that the Executive can be closeted with parties representing certain interests, and can frame laws in their interest and send them here and they can be passed at his bidding.

Mr. President, possibly I owe an apology to the Senate. I had no expectation of being led into saying all that I have. Possibly some things I have said are imprudent or impolitic to be said. Nevertheless they are true.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator from Georgia takes his seat I should like to ask him whether or not it ever entered his mind that this alleged conference—I have been called down recently about my bluntness and directness and warned that I ought not to blurt out things at first hand; so I am getting a little cautious. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks this interview or conference, whether actual or alleged, indicates a determination to coerce or compel or persuade our brethren on the other side to pass such a law or such a series of laws, or whether it indicates that the President himself, after out-Heroding Herod in the denunciation of the predatory rich, after exciting the admiration of the unthinking throughout the land as to his being the last and the only honest man and patriot, is at this very moment making his peace with these captains of industry with a view to have them cease their opposition to the nomination of his lieutenant or of himself in June?

Mr. BACON. I will not express any view on that point, because I have no right to without further information.

Mr. TILLMAN. Could not the Senator guess? I guessed as soon as I read it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. I prefer to state facts rather than to attribute motives.

I will state another fact which is a very remarkable one. I have been chided by some of my friends for having apologized for what I have said. I apologized to the Senate for my possibly undue vehemence, but I coupled that apology with the statement that what I have said, while it might be imprudent or impolitic, was true. To that extent——

Mr. TILLMAN. Why imprudent if it is true?

Mr. BACON. Possibly it may not have been imprudent. We will pass that by. But in addition I want to say this, that it is not simply in the matter of framing legislation that we find these conferences. If the newspapers are correct, some months ago, when it was proposed by the greatest trust in the United States—certainly one of the greatest trusts in the United States, and one, by the way, that has never been proceeded against—to take over a competing iron and steel industry of large proportions in the South, and before it was done those who were about to accomplish it came to the White House and had it well understood beforehand that they would not suffer any prosecution—I will not use the word "prosecution," because

I do not know that that word was used, but that there would be no outcry, no condemnation of it if it was done—and in a few days thereafter it was done. We have heard no single word of condemnation of it. It may be that that is an absolute, utter untruth as published by the newspapers. I can only repeat that it was published in the newspapers, and I give credence to it because we have been led by our experience to know that when anything is charged, we will say, if it is not true, there is no delay in the denial of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to ask whether or not in this case about which the Senator has just spoken, of the steel trust taking over the Tennessee Coal and Iron Company——

Mr. BACON. Yes; that is what I mean.

Mr. TILLMAN. At the show down did not Mr. Garfield get an order from the White House to go and investigate it?

Mr. BACON. I have not been so informed if he did.

Mr. TILLMAN. Wonderful! Wonderful!

Mr. BACON. I will ask the Senator from South Carolina if he has any such information?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have never heard of it myself, but, then, I have seen so many instructions to Mr. Garfield to investigate this trust or that, or the iniquity of this millionaire or that multimillionaire, that of course I take it for granted that some secret order was issued to that effect, and we will get the fruits after a while in a report.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I wish to say a word or two about labor on the Isthmus of Panama. The Commission reports that all skilled labor comes from the United States, and then it gives a list of the men and their pay. Common engineers on a steam shovel get as high as $210 a month. The man who handles the crane gets $185 a month. Recently there was a general strike there, and a large number of men who had been getting those salaries left the canal work. Practically all of the skilled labor comes from the United States and is on a list called the gold list.

Mr. McLAURIN. Does the Senator state that there is a law requiring that the skilled laborers shall be citizens of the United States?

Mr. TELLER. No, sir; there is none that I am aware of.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is a regulation of the Commission?

Mr. TELLER. No. They take those who come and are qualified, and the Commission says the skilled labor comes from the United States. I do not myself believe that any common labor in this country, including the colored people, if they go there, will remain any length of time. The common Jamaica negro will not do as much in three days as a common white man will do in one up here. I do not believe any white man will work there for any length of time.

I have some knowledge of ancient conditions on the Isthmus, when the railroad was built. When I was quite a young man a large number of young men from my neighborhood in western New York went down to work on the railroad. I would not undertake to say how many, but I should say several dozen of them went from the neighborhood in which I lived. Some of them I had personal acquaintance with and some I had not. I have recollection of but one of them returning. They died off there in a way that was simply frightful. Now the condition is not so bad there. It is better than it was then. But there is not a white man there who does not now take his preventive medicine practically every day. It is no place for common American laborers to go, and they would not go there if they were invited to go.

Mr. President, I am one of the few men on this side who voted that we should buy our supplies in the United States. I made a statement then. I had two reasons for it. In the first place I have always believed in patronizing American industries. I believe in home industries. I made another statement which I am going to repeat. I said I believed practically all of the benefits which would be derived from the canal would be the market there for American products, and I do not intend to deny the American producer that market, if I can help it.

Mr. FRYE. I accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia as a separate section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 2. That in every such contract the party, or parties, bidding on the same shall be authorized to submit bids to deliver said material and equipment, in the alternative, either—

1. On docks within reach of the ship's tackle at seaports of the United States, named by the bidder.

2. On docks, at the option of the bidder, at Colon or La Boca (1) in ships of American register; (2) in ships of foreign register.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of moving that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next. But I think the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has a proposition with regard to the currency bill which he desires to present to the Senate, so that for the moment I will withhold the motion.

GEORGE S. PATTEN.

Mr. FLINT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17277) for the relief of George S. Patten, of Williams, Coconino County, Ariz.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to issue a deed of conveyance to George S. Patten to the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter and lots 1, 2, and 3 in section 18, township 23 north, range 6 east, Gila and Salt River base and meridian, Arizona Territory.

Mr. KEAN. Inasmuch as we have had some trouble to-day about the granting of land, I suggest that the report be read.

Mr. FLINT. I can make a statement which I think will enlighten the Senator.

This piece of land was filed upon by Mr. Patten fourteen days before the land was, by proclamation, made a forest reserve, and the settler remained upon the land for five years without notice from the Land Department. Then he made an application for a patent, and he ascertained that the land was within a forest reserve. The recommendation of the Land Department is that the bill be passed and the title be granted to Mr. Patten.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move an executive session.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from South Carolina yield to me for a moment in order that I may get an order for printing?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. There seems to be a large demand for a document which has not yet been printed, so I can not give its number. But it is the document authorized yesterday or the day before at the request of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; that is to say, the one containing the President's messages and the reports of the committee on the Brownsville affray. I ask the adoption of the order I send to the desk.

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed and bound in paper covers, 10,000 copies of Senate Document No. ——, Sixtieth Congress, first session, relating to the Brownsville affray.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 16, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 13, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, my attention this morning was called to a publication in the Post, under the startling headline "Bribery charge falls." In these days of lightly made charges, when the air is rife with suspicion, I naturally read the article with great interest, and was surprised to find when I had got into it a little way the statements as follows:

Some time ago Mr. SLAYDEN of Texas made a speech in the House in which statements were made that there was in the possession of the Department of the Interior evidence of this misconduct, and that no effort had been made to investigate and punish the guilty if guilt were established. Following this, Mr. TILLMAN offered resolutions in the Senate calling upon the Attorney-General for all information in the hands of the Department of Justice and upon Secretary Garfield for such information as the Department of the Interior might have.

Mr. Speaker, this has reference to improper conduct against a court in the Indian Territory.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that this is not a question of privilege.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit to the Speaker if when my name is associated with charges of a serious character against a branch of this Government, that the Secretary of the Interior says is unfounded, is it not a question of privilege?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I think the paper has simply made a mistake in the use of my name. Just to whom it refers I do not know. I never heard of the charges; I never heard, in fact, of the court in any specific way until to-day.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that the other morning paper, the Herald, gives his colleague from Texas, Mr. SHEPPARD, the distinction of making the speech, making one paper say that Mr. SHEPPARD made the speech and the other that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] made the speech, while in fact the speech was printed and was made by the gentleman from Texas, Mr. STEPHENS? [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I assume that if the charges were made by any of my colleagues from Texas, it was by Mr. STEPHENS, who represents the minority on the Committee on Indian Affairs. I want to say for him that he is a man of unusual prudence, and would not prefer charges against any man without foundation. He does not make unfounded statements.

Mr. MANN. In justice to Mr. STEPHENS——

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose this discussion is by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. This is a proceeding by way of unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Let the RECORD show, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. STEPHENS did not make the charges, but the charges were made in a brief by attorneys in the case, which brief was included in Mr. STEPHENS's speech, and which charges were not vouched for by Mr. STEPHENS at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, my only purpose was to acquit myself in the minds of fellow Members of the habit of making charges against public officials that could not be substantiated.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN UPPER MISSISSIPPI VALLEY.

Mr. SPIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file the views of the minority of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries on the bill (H. R. 13659) to establish a biological and fish-cultural station in upper Mississippi Valley.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that matters on the Private Calendar in order to-day shall follow immediately the conclusion of the bill now pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that business in order to-day shall follow the conclusion of the post-office appropriation bill, now pending. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask whether, if the post-office appropriation bill should be concluded fairly early to-day, the gentleman intends to proceed to-day with the pension business?

Mr. SULLOWAY. We will endeavor to do so if the House will stay with us.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

RETURN OF A BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following request from the Senate, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 903) to amend section 2, chapter 433, 30 Statutes at Large, entitled "An act to confirm title to lots 13 and 14, in square 959, in Washington, D. C."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request is granted.

There was no objection.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18347, the post-office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the post-office appropriation bill, with Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of agent and assistants to examine and distribute registry envelopes, agent, $2,000; chief clerk, $1,000; one clerk, at $900; and one laborer, at $660; in all, $4,560.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that provision creating a new division under the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, late yesterday afternoon I explained that by reason of the change of contracts for the registry envelopes and the stamped envelopes and the official envelopes it becomes necessary to increase the number of these agencies. Under the present law all of the contracts for the manufacture of these three different character of articles were let in one city, the city of Hartford, Conn. Hence but one agency was necessary. By reason of the fact that different contractors have secured the contracts for stamped envelopes and official envelopes, the first being at Dayton, Ohio, and the other at Cincinnati, Ohio, it becomes necessary to continue the agency at Hartford for the registry envelopes. This is not a new agency which is now before the committee, but is merely the same agency that has remained at Hartford for the examination and distribution of the registry articles. The new agency was the one created for Dayton and Cincinnati, which I explained yesterday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I withdrew the point of order yesterday on the statement of a member of the committee on this side of the House that the other provision would effect considerable economy in the administration of the office.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman will appreciate that following the contracts for registry envelopes and stamped envelopes and official envelopes there must be some representative of the Government to examine as to the quality of the paper used and to supervise the distribution. As long as all of those contracts were in one city one agency could supervise all of the contracts, but now there are three different contracts in three different cities. We have created only one additional agency, permitting the Dayton agency to supervise the official envelope contract at Cincinnati. The heaviest part of the three several contracts is the stamped envelope contract, but the registry envelopes are more important than the official ones, and therefore we are obliged to maintain the agency at Hartford.

Mr. TAWNEY. How do the salaries compare with the salaries of the other institutions?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The salaries at Hartford we have reduced, the agent being reduced from $2,500 to $2,000, because there is less work for him to perform than when all the contracts were supervised under the one agency.

The salaries of the agency at Dayton are the same as the original agency at Hartford. We made no change in that schedule of salaries because we placed the contract for official envelopes at Cincinnati under the supervision of the agency at Dayton.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What was the amount of saving upon the contract by distributing it among different departments?

Mr. OVERSTREET. As a matter of fact, the increased volume of the business requires a larger appropriation to carry out the contract. I do not recall what the difference was in the bid upon the specific items of the contract. The gentleman realizes that in the registry service the volume of the business actually increases and naturally it requires more money to pay for the contract for that service. But we have reduced the expenses of the agency for the reason that a part of the work which has gone to Dayton and Cincinnati is no longer discharged at Hartford.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not for service in the city of Hartford?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; this is at Hartford. This is the agency located at the point where the contract for the registry envelopes is in process of manufacture.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the chairman of the committee whether the work of this agency goes to the extent of examining the character of the paper that is furnished?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. With the view to determining whether it is up to the contract?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to ask also in respect to this matter. I see by the hearings of the Committee on Appropriations, and I know by the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, that both the Bureau of Standards and the Bureau of Chemistry are claiming credit for having detected the fact that paper much below the standard contracted for was being furnished to the Government, and I wonder if it appeared before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads whether both of those Bureaus were really entitled to that credit, and, if not both of them, which one was entitled to it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I really do not know. So far as the agency at Hartford is concerned, I regret to say that the agent did not discharge his duty as effectually as he ought, and a great deal of paper was passed at a lower grade than should have been accepted. That agent has been removed.

Mr. SCOTT. Has the agent a chemistry laboratory at his command?

Mr. OVERSTREET. They have at Dayton, Ohio, where the contract is located for stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers. They have a laboratory there by which they can test the quality of the paper.

Mr. SCOTT. At the other places how do they make the test?

Mr. OVERSTREET. At Cincinnati they would make the test from the Dayton agency, and my understanding is that there is also a laboratory at Hartford for the registry office.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentlemen if there is any agency for the inspection of mail bags? The mail bags used by the Government are manufactured in my district, and have hitherto been inspected by the local postmaster, assisted by an inspector sent out from the Department here. Only a few months since the local postmaster told me that he had been relieved from the onerous duty, having spent about perhaps a third of his time in the personal inspection of every mail bag that was manufactured.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is no special distinct agency for that purpose. The inspection of the mail bags is under the direction of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and the work is performed either by the officials of his office or by post-office inspectors who are detailed for that purpose.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to know why these other inspections could not be performed in the same way by inspectors sent out periodically from the Department here.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That would be a very lax method of inspection where the quality of the paper would have to be followed as closely as it does in the manufacture of stamped envelopes and registry matter. It does not require the same technical scrutiny of the material that enters into mail bags.

Mr. PAYNE. He informed me he had to handle every mail bag and look it over and see if it was perfect. Now, it seems to me that there might be a periodical inspection of the paper, and so forth, used in the manufacture of envelopes, and perhaps there would not be the same mistakes or laxity of inspection that have hitherto occurred under the system at Hartford, for instance.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Another thing I would suggest, that in the manufacture of the papers of envelopes and the stamped envelopes and the stamped newspaper wrappers the supplies are sent to the various offices directly from the place of manufacture under the direction of these agencies, while in the case of the mail bags they are sent to a common point, from which they are given distribution.

Mr. PAYNE. I have got the idea that they are distributed from the place they are made.

Mr. OVERSTREET. My understanding is that they are distributed from the repair shop at Washington.

Mr. PAYNE. That is an extraordinary expense that should not be incurred.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The manufacturer pays the expense of delivering them here.

Mr. PAYNE. Why, of course the manufacturer does not do it unless he gets it back from the Government. There is nothing saved in that way. He is not doing it for his health.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in the latter part of February I received a letter from Mr. John W. Coble, postmaster at Sugar Tree, a town in my district. The letter reads as follows:

SUGAR TREE, TENN., February 21, 1908.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

FRIEND: Can there be any plan devised to prohibit a rural carrier or a postmaster from selling a money order to a minor for which to buy whisky with when they know that they are buying the order for this purpose?

A large majority of the whisky that comes here is drank by minors. If we could stop them from buying money orders to whisky houses they would only have one other way, and that is to register the money. And if you could stop the money order you could stop the register just the same.

Our citizens are well pleased with the move you have made against whisky, and would be better pleased to have you carry it a few steps farther, as you know that it is dangerous to our boys to have them dabbling with whisky houses.

It was only last evening our rural carrier applied for a money order to be sent to a whisky house. And this was not the worst. The minor is an orphan, his parents both dead, and he is only 16 years of age. Do all you can for us along this line and we are solid for you. Hoping that you may accomplish a great work along this line, I am,

Your friend,

JOHN W. COBLE, Postmaster.

Mr. Chairman, the condition described in the letter from Mr. Coble exists in many places in my district, as well as in many other localities in Tennessee not located in my district. The laws of Tennessee forbid the selling or giving away of intoxicating liquors to minors, but this law is circumvented in the way pointed out by Mr. Coble. I sent Mr. Coble's letter to the Postmaster-General and asked him if he could, by regulation, provide for the situation and prevent the issue of money orders to minors, where it was known to the postmaster issuing the order that it was intended to be used in the purchase of intoxicating liquors.

I further asked him that, if he was not authorized to make such regulations as the situation required without additional legislation, to kindly suggest what legislation was needed. I have just received his reply to my letter, which I now read:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 11 1908.

The Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In compliance with request made in your letter of February 25, receipt of which was acknowledged on the 27th ultimo, herewith is returned the communication addressed to you under date of the 21st ultimo by Mr. John Coble, postmaster at Sugar Tree, Tenn., suggesting that measures be taken to prevent the use of the money order and registry systems by minors in the purchase of intoxicating liquors.

Replying further, I beg to say that, in its judgment, this Department under existing law has no right to intervene by forbidding the use of the money-order and registry systems under circumstances like those stated in your letter and in the communication of the postmaster at Sugar Tree; and that in considering your suggestion as to possible need of additional legislation along this line it is impressed with the impracticability of any measure which would exclude remittances of funds from the ordinary mails in cases of the kind mentioned. If under the law as it stands an order could be issued forbidding the use of the money order and registry systems by minors in negotiating for supplies of interdicted goods, it would still not prevent the transmission of money, checks, or express money orders by them for the same purpose in letters not registered, and in my judgment it would be exceedingly difficult, if at all possible, to frame an act which would stop recourse to this method in cases of this kind and not hinder legitimate or proper use of the mails. It is thought that legislation for the purpose of restraining delivery to minors by carriers (transportation and express companies) of consignments of liquor sent in the form of original packages or otherwise might be of more effect in preventing traffic of the sort referred to in your letter and that of the postmaster at Sugar Tree than any addition to or amendment of the laws governing the use of the mails.

Faithfully, yours, G. v. L. MEYER.

Mr. Chairman, the reply of the Postmaster-General emphasizes the great importance of such legislation as is proposed in the Littlefield bill, and I take this opportunity to beg of the Judiciary Committee to report that bill or some other that will meet a situation that can be met in no other way.

Mr. HINSHAW. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to have order and should like to have the attention of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing pending.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word. If I can have the attention of the committee, I would like to answer an inquiry that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] made of me yesterday. The committee will remember that I was discussing the question of a reform in our transportation service in hauling public moneys, bonds, and securities, because of the excessive charges paid by the Government and the people. The gentleman from Ohio stated, from general information, of course, that bonds were not hauled in the mails.

Mr. KEIFER. By express from the Treasury to the depository. That is my recollection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact the Register's report, fiscal year 1907, which I have here, contains language very clear and unmistakable. I read from that report, page 461, of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, fiscal year 1907, under the heading "Register of the Treasury," the following:

There was received by registered mail 2,401 packages, containing bonds amounting to $26,378,651. There were sent from the office by registered mail 4,435 packages, containing bonds amounting to $53,000,000.

Mr. KEIFER. That has nothing to do with the question I suggested, that of private persons sending bonds.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, that language is all right here.

Mr. KEIFER. That has nothing to do with the question of the Government transmitting bonds from the Treasury to the depositories and from one depository to another.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I said sent in and sent back to the office.

Mr. KEIFER. To the individual.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. These bonds were sent to and from the Register's office by registered mail, and they were Government property or held in trust by the Government and sent to and from by mail.

Mr. KEIFER. It is not Government property at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Whether that is true or not these bonds were carried to and from the Treasury by mail. I also find that the expense incurred by the Government in transmitting by express is very large and by mail very small, and that the amount sent by express is very large and that sent by mail is infinitesimal. I find also that the Treasurer of the United States in the transmission of currency backward and forward to the Treasury recommends that it be transmitted by registered mail insured. The national banks, he says, are doing that and the Government should do the same thing, of course to save money, secure of competition, and to give the people clean money, as far as possible.

I also find that we pay for hauling silver dollars by express about $260,000 annually. Here are the figures right here. I will not take up the time of the committee to read them, but will place them in the RECORD. I insist again, gentlemen, that we should reform this forty-year-old express contract and refix these rates and arrange the law to carry a part of these moneys and properties by mail.

As I recall it, we have had a deficiency for the last ten years because of this transportation, each and every year. Now there is practically only one company, the United States Express Company, which extends clear across the continent. All the other intersecting lines, the Adams, the Southern, and the Wells-Fargo, are dominated by this great concern.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move to close debate in two minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like one minute.

Mr. KEIFER. I should like one minute in reply.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit it as a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph close in two minutes, one minute to be yielded to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] and the other minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This report also states that the Comptroller states that it costs the Government $264,000 for the transportation of standard silver dollars, and he further states that in 1888 we transferred $28,000,000 at $1.89, and that in 1907 we transferred $37,000,000 at a cost of $2.40. So it seems, Mr. Chairman, that as we give the express company more business to do the charges increase, and the Government foots the bill, not only in the regular appropriations, but by coming in here every year, as I state and charge, calling for a deficiency of $25,000 or $30,000. When is this going to stop, Mr. Chairman? Not until Congress takes it up as it should do. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. One minute is abundant time to answer this explanation which does not explain. I referred to the carriage of bonds between the Treasury Department and its depositaries; but the gentleman has read a lot of things to show that the people of the United States use the mails. I never controverted that.

The gentleman is mistaken about the amount of money that is appropriated from year to year to carry silver dollars. Since I have been recently in Congress $125,000 annually has been the limit, and for this year only $50,000 has been appropriated.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent to return to page 24 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment that was offered yesterday and objected to because it was not understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to page 24 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the proposed amendment?

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment I propose is in the paragraph found in the bill on page 24, following the word "dollars," in line 8, and striking out in that paragraph, beginning with the word "deposited," in line 11, to the end of the paragraph, and substituting therefor the words "covered into the Treasury of the United States," so that it will read:

That hereafter all moneys recovered or collected on account of loss of first-class domestic registered matter which in the course of adjustment are not restored to the original owners, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 8, after the word "dollars," strike out all of lines 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, and insert in lieu thereof the words: "That hereafter all moneys recovered or collected on account of loss of first-class domestic registered matter which in the course of adjustment are not restored to the original owners, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to return to the page indicated for the purpose of offering this amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether the verb in line 10 should not be "is" instead of "are?" Does it not refer to the domestic registered matter which, in the course of adjustment, is not restored to the original owner? I do not want to have a grammatical error here, which might lead to the provision being held to be unconstitutional. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the subject of the verb is the word "moneys," in line 8.

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentleman from Wisconsin assumes the responsibility for the grammar, I shall not worry about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. STAFFORD. I will assume the responsibility, inasmuch as I had the privilege of drafting it in the original bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Wisconsin informs me that the moneys that are collected are not collected by reason of any existing law, but are fines arbitrarily imposed by the Post-Office Department upon the clerks who it is claimed are negligent, and as a result of which these registered packages are lost.

Section 4050 and section 4059 of the Revised Statutes expressly provide that all fines and penalties imposed for the violation of the postal laws shall be covered into the Treasury. Upon the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin, that these fines and penalties are not imposed because of any law, but because of the arbitrary action of the Post-Office Department, I am withdrawing the objection previously made. I believe that moneys collected, no matter how, should not be held by any official, but should be turned into the Treasury, only to be appropriated by Congress.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think the present statute covers the case, and therefore I offered the amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a page of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1907, and, as I understood, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] said we paid only about $25,000 a year for the transportation of silver coin——

Mr. KEIFER. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. KEIFER. I said the appropriation was $125,000 a year for the carriage of silver dollars——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right; I will reply to that.

Mr. KEIFER. For this year, and that the appropriation was only $50,000 for next year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Secretary says:

The circulation of silver dollars at the end of July, 1904, was $70,581,561, and at the end of June, 1907, $81,710,444, or an increase of $11,128,883, which represents the results accomplished by the distribution of $124,051,692 of these coins in the meantime at a total expense to the Government of "$264,838" for "transportation charges." It will readily be seen that the average expense attending the increase in circulation was at the rate of $23.80 for each $1,000.

This same report, in a table on the same page, says that in 1888, when the Department transported $28,000,000, the rate was $1.80 per $1,000. When the Department transported $37,000,000 in 1907 it cost $2.40 a thousand. The more these express companies are given to haul, the greater the rate they charge.

Now, that plain language read from page 14 of this Republican report, the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, shows these facts. I am satisfied that the gentleman from Ohio has not studied this question closely, or he would be for this reform. And I am reasonably certain that after I have brought it to his attention sharply he will use his great mind, he will use his great body, and use his great eloquence in making his committee bring in a reform measure that will stop the robbery of the American people and the American Treasury by this express octopus that hauls these coins. [Applause.]

I will insert the extract from the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year 1907, as follows:

Attention is invited to the following comparative statement, showing the maximum and minimum circulation and the amount distributed at the expense of the Government during each fiscal year for the past twenty years:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For blanks, blank books, printed and engraved matter, binding and carbon paper for the money-order service, $225,000.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. According to the report of the hearings before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the division of adjustment of railway mail pay produced before the committee two sets of papers. The first consists of copies furnished by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General specifying the route and the authorization of railroad mail service, and a copy of the letter accepting the same, and a copy of the order authorizing the transportation of mails over the Buffalo, Rochester and Pittsburg Railway Company, and so forth. (Route No. 110255.)

The papers produced show an acceptance of an offer by the railroad company and an order establishing the service February 13, 1905, and yet on page 303 of the hearings is a statement of what purports to be an order of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that from July 1, 1901 (three years and a half before the service was instituted), to July 30, 1905, the Buffalo, Rochester and Pittsburg Railroad Company is to be paid quarterly for the transportation of the mails between Ridge Junction and Iselin, Pa., at the rate of $824.22 per annum, being $42.75 per mile for 19.28 miles, and so forth. It seemed to me a most startling proposition that payment should be given to a railroad company for three and a half years before any service was rendered, and at a rate of compensation in excess of that agreed upon, to continue from the date of establishment to the end of the period.

I accordingly called at office of the chief of the railway adjustment division and saw the record of order No. B 5667, contained in daybook 142, and according to the record that order reads from July 1, 1905, to June 13, 1909, and therefore there was no such case of maladministration as is presented by the order as printed on page 303 of these hearings. It seems to be but simple justice to the Post-Office Department, particularly to W. S. Shallenberger, then Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and to this House that this explanation should be made. The question is very naturally suggested, whether an inquiry as to the manner in which this gross error occurred, whereby injustice is done by the appearance of crime being cast upon Department officials, and the House and country are deceived, may be made. If the perversion was malicious, the author of the misstatement should be severely punished. These official reports from Departments ought to impart verity and be such that we may rely upon them. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, just a word. The criticism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER], which undoubtedly leaves it to be inferred that the committee in its hearings is responsible for this error——

Mr. WANGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not mean to charge or insinuate that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I say the gentleman's language leaves that impression.

Mr. WANGER. It may be that my language was unhappy; the idea was not in my thought.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I merely wish to say that in all the hearings that the committee has of Department officials we invariably follow the practice of permitting the officer who has appeared before the committee to revise the stenographer's minutes, and if there are any errors or misprints, as finally printed, it is quite as much the error of the Department in not carefully examining the stenographer's minutes as anybody else.

Mr. WANGER. May I add that Mr. Stewart declared that the error must either have been the error of the clerk in the Department or an error in the Government Printing Office? He imputed nothing to the committee, and I did not intend to impute any connection with the error or responsibility for it to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Supplies for the city delivery service, including letter boxes, letter-box fasteners, package boxes, posts, furniture, satchels, straps, baskets, time cards, time-card frames, time-recorder supplies, maps, transfer designs, and stencils, $90,000.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 24, after the word "dollars," add the following:
"Provided, That letter carriers may be permitted to use other straps than those supplied by the Government if they prefer them, and buy and pay for them out of their own money."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I wish first, if I can get the attention of the committee, to say a few words about this amendment on its merits. Mr. Chairman, the request embodied in this amendment does not impose upon the Government one dollar of expense in any possible way. It does not subject the Government or the Post-Office Department to any possible risk of expense in any way. The Government now buys its supplies. All of the straps are alike. They are single straps, and for a right-handed man the pouch is at the right side.

The single strap goes over his right shoulder and is fastened to the pouch. A man named Frank A. Felts, in my district, made this strap which I have in my hand. It is a double strap, and it goes over both shoulders.

Mr. MURDOCK. As a matter of fact, does it go over the head as the gentleman has placed it upon himself? Does it not go over one arm?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Of course all carriers are not as large as I am, and it will fit some better than it fits me. I went to the Department and asked simply this, that men who have tried this strap, and who like it, and who want to use it and are willing to buy and pay for it out of their own money, be permitted to buy and pay for it out of their own money and use it. My request was denied on the ground that it did not give satisfaction; that it was tried out in Baltimore and also in Washington, and the postmaster of Baltimore and the assistant postmaster of Washington said it did not give satisfaction. I have a letter from an eminent physician and surgeon in my district, Dr. Martin Cavana, and he says that he has tested this strap and that it equalizes the weight, putting exactly half on each shoulder, and that it tends toward health, because it permits a man to carry his load and stand up straight. I have the letters of thirteen or fourteen men who have used this strap. One of them used it for eight months and another for nine months, and others have used them for different periods. I have letters from various carriers in our State and also from the State of Pennsylvania, and they all say that they would not do without this strap, even though it cost several times as much as it does. It can be bought for a dollar or less. It seems to me there can be no question about the merits of this proposition. I do not ask any man to wear this strap who does not want it. I do not ask the Government to adopt it. I do not ask the Government to recommend it. I simply ask that any man who is willing to pay 60 or 70 cents or a dollar for it be permitted to buy it, if it helps him, makes it easier for him to carry his load.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported, and then I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The amendment does not apply to that particular strap, but to any strap?

Mr. DRISCOLL. To any strap.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If this provision should become the law, would not the effect be that the people behind this strap and the people behind other straps would instantly commence to flood the mails and send to every letter carrier in the United States glowing descriptions, telling them how they would preserve their length of years and health by the purchase of those straps?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I do not think so.

Mr. MANN. Would not a great many letter carriers, believing the glowing descriptions, purchase a strap which the Government officials think is no better than the strap that the Government furnishes?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I do not think so—first, because there is not money enough in it, and second, because a variety of straps can not be made. You have got to have a strap that goes over one shoulder or over both shoulders. What difference if the men want to buy them and pay for them?

Mr. SULZER. Is that a patented strap?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it is. I am not sure about it.

Mr. WANGER. Does your amendment permit the carrier to wear the strap irrespective of the discretion of the Postmaster-General or whatever wishes he has in the matter, or does it only permit him to purchase and use the strap with his permission?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I dare say if this amendment is adopted the Department will permit the men to buy this strap or any other strap in use, provided they pay for them.

Mr. WANGER. Would not your amendment compel the Department to permit the carriers to wear this or any other form of strap that the carrier's idiosyncrasies might lead him to select?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I am not sure about that. It is not a question of idiosyncrasy. When a man has to carry a load of 50 pounds he wants to carry it in the easiest possible way. He wants the burden on both shoulders, if he can have it, instead of on one shoulder. As it is now, a man can not walk up straight under the heavy load, but by the use of this strap he could do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DRISCOLL. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not a fact that the principal objection of the Department in adopting this strap is its cost—that it would cost so much that there would be very serious objection to its being adopted for general use?

Mr. DRISCOLL. The letter I received from the Department, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. I received permission from the Department to do so. I also ask permission to put the letters from those men who used this strap in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. I have permission from the men to do so.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand your theory is, inasmuch as the carrier must carry the load and not the Department, that the carrier's wishes in the matter and his convenience ought to be consulted rather than that of the Department?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I certainly think so. If, for instance, the Department should prescribe a certain kind of shoe, and that a man could not wear the kind of shoes prescribed without difficulty and discomfort, he should be permitted to purchase shoes that do not hurt him, especially if he pay for them with his own money.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES POST-OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., August 6, 1907.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

SIR: Complying with the instruction contained in your letter of June 17 last, the two samples of the Felts shoulder straps were used by several of the carriers of this office with the result that the straps proved to be uncomfortable, continually getting under the collar and pinching the flesh.

The continual shifting of the satchel when filled with mail caused the wheel to slip from the chain. These straps are too heavy of construction and have proven to be generally unsatisfactory. They do not equalize the weight of the satchel. The chain of one strap broke on the sixth day of its use; the other strap has been in use since June 22. Both are being forwarded to the Department under separate cover.

Very respectfully,

POSTMASTER,
By MADISON DAVIS,
Assistant Postmaster.

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER,
Baltimore, Md., September 11, 1907.

Hon. F. H. HITCHCOCK,
First Assistant Postmaster-General, Free Delivery System.

SIR: Under date August 9th ultimo (DH) there was forwarded to this office a sample of the Felts shoulder strap for use by carriers, which was directed to be placed in experimental service at this office and report submitted. This has been done thoroughly and carefully; the result is unfavorable. While it might be advantageous to adopt some method of supporting the weight of carriers' satchels from both instead of but from one shoulder, the device submitted is insusceptible of adjustment to different sizes and shapes of figures; it is heavy; it confines the free action of the body; it causes the wearer to suffer from the heat, and its metal traveling wheel and chain may be expected to wear uniforms rapidly.

The device has been tried by quite a number of the carriers at this office, and their reports are unanimously disapproving, in which conclusion I concur.

The sample is returned under separate cover.

Very respectfully.

W. HALL HARRIS, Postmaster.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, December 18, 1907.

Mr. F. A. FELTS, Oneida, N. Y.

SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 9th instant requesting that you be permitted to furnish a number of the Felts shoulder straps for trial by the carriers of the Washington, D. C., post-office.

In reply you are informed that a thorough test of your shoulder strap was recently made by the Department, in which it was demonstrated that it was not superior to the one now being used by the carriers, which can undoubtedly be purchased at less cost.

In view of the information obtained by the Department, it is not deemed advisable to have a further test made.

Respectfully,

F. H. HITCHCOCK,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, January 12, 1908.

Hon. M. E. DRISCOLL,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your recent call with reference to the Felts shoulder strap and to your request that you be advised whether carriers would be permitted to use such shoulder straps if purchased by themselves, I have to inform you that inasmuch as a thorough test of these straps by the Department has demonstrated that they are not superior to those now being used and that they do not equalize the weight on both shoulders as claimed, it has been decided that it would be inadvisable to permit of their use by carriers.

In compliance with your request, I inclose copies of the unfavorable reports received concerning the shoulder strap in question.

Very truly, yours,

F. H. HITCHCOCK,
First Assistant Postmaster-General.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1908.

Hon. FRANK H. HITCHCOCK,
First Assistant Postmaster-General,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have received yours of the 22d instant declining to permit letter carriers to use the Felts shoulder strap if they purchased it themselves, and also the copies of unfavorable reports as to the same.

I have read and can submit many testimonials in favor of this strap, and had them with me when I called at the Department, and can submit them at any time if you will consent that this matter be opened up for reconsideration.

If I were asking the Government to buy these straps or for anything which would cause the Government or Department any expense or any risk of expense I would not be surprised at my request being denied, for the Department should move as conservatively and economically as possible. But all I have asked is that men who know this Felts strap and like it and prefer it to the other may be permitted to buy and use it. If, with respect to them, it eases the load or causes it to bear on both shoulders instead of one, or make their work easier, it seems to me permission should be granted to them to do so.

I remain, very truly, yours,

M. E. DRISCOLL.

SYLVAN BEACH, N. Y., February 11, 1907.

Mr. FRANK A. FELTS, Oneida, N. Y.

SIR: The Felts double shoulder strap sent me for inspection and experiment I herewith return. I am pleased to report to you that the end sought by you in this device, that of distributing the pouch load between the two shoulders of the body, has been fully achieved. With a pouch loaded with 50 pounds weight (which I understand is about the average weight of the ordinary carrier's load), I have weighed the tension on each of the three pouch attachments in your belt, with the following results: Tension on the rear strap attached to the left ring of the pouch, 25 pounds, less 4 pounds friction upon the body; tension on the right and left straps, which are attached to the pulley and right ring of the pouch, I have found to be 12½ pounds each, less a friction of 2½ pounds against the body in each of the two straps, with the body of the carrier perfectly poised. Changes of the position of the body varies the tension of the two front straps, shifting by means of the pulley, from one shoulder to the other, according to the poise or position of the body, thus accommodating the pouch weight carried to the two shoulders of the carrier and maintaining a practically even pressure upon the anatomical structures of the shoulders and chest, and enabling the carrier to transport his load with about 50 per cent less lateral muscular strain than that required with the two-hooked common strap, which compelled the suspension of the entire burden on the right shoulder and chest structures, and an equalizing muscular counter strain on the muscles of the right half of the body trunk.

The merits of your invention can not but be readily appreciated by all who examine the same, and I predict the early adoption of the double shoulder strap by our Federal postal authorities when they are made aware of its valuable features.

Respectfully, yours,

M. CAVANA.

UTICA, N. Y., December 17, 1906.

Mr. FRANK A. FELTS.

DEAR SIR: I have used your strap for about two months and I do not hesitate to recommend it to all carriers, especially those who are obliged to handle heavy loads.

I have always been troubled with pains in my shoulder, caused mostly from carrying heavy loads with the single straps most carriers are now using. But after using your strap for a short time I was not troubled in this respect, and besides I could carry the load much easier.

The relief I get from the use of your strap is worth more to me than the small amount you ask for them.

I believe that all carriers giving them a satisfactory trial will think as I do.

I am, fraternally, yours,

JOHN F. BRAND.

FRANK A. FELTS, Esq.

DEAR SIR: I am using the double shoulder strap of your manufacture and like it very much. A heavy load can be carried with much greater ease than with the old style of single strap. It never slips out of position, and the letter bag will not wear the uniform nearly as fast as with the old-style single strap. It is easily adjusted to fit any carrier, and is, in my opinion (after having given it a practical test), a very decided improvement over the old style. I believe that any carrier who has once used one of your double straps on Monday morning will never wish to go back to the old style.

I am, respectfully,

W. P. COUCH,
Carrier No. 50, Rochester, N. Y.

The FELTS DOUBLE SHOULDER STRAP CO.,
Oneida, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: I received the strap you mailed me some months ago, and have refrained from answering your former letter as I wished to give it a good trial. Having done so, I find it is about what is needed in the letter-carrying business. It answers the requirements and equalizes the load to a nicety. It is a little awkward at first, but after one becomes used to it he finds that it is about the proper article. Wishing you success in your venture, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

ARCHIE S. NICHOLS,
47 Taggert street.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., December 22, 1906.

FRIEND FELTS: Now have a first time to answer your letter. Several of the boys tried out the strap and think well of it, before a prohibitive order was received. I presume a similar order has been received by Hodge with reference to trying out such things without permission from the Department. I have the strap, awaiting your order. Would suggest that you write direct to the local carriers' association.

Best regards,

S. M. SMITH.

CANASTOTA, N. Y., December 1, 1907.

Mr. FRANK FELTS, Oneida, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: I have used your patent carrier strap for three months and find that it goes far ahead of my expectations. I would recommend it to any carrier who is looking for something to add to his comfort when carrying a heavy load.

Yours, truly,

Mr. C. A. LEE, Oneida, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: The Felts shoulder strap I find, after a thorough test of several months, to be far superior to the single strap furnished by the Department. With it the load rests evenly on both shoulders and carrying the heavy loads with much more ease. Moreover, the Felts, shoulder strap allows the sack to hang free from the person, thus preventing the wearing of the coat. I would not return to the single strap for double the price of the Felts strap.

Yours, truly,

O. M. YOUNG,
Carrier No. 3, Oneida, N. Y.

DECEMBER 10, 1906.

Mr. C. A. LEE:

After nine months' use of the Felts shoulder strap I find it meets the requirements in handling heavy loads, and the longer I use it the better I like it. I consider it a great boon to letter carriers and would not be without it for ten times the price it cost me.

Yours, sincerely,

U. S. JOHNSTON, Carrier No. 5.

ELMIRA, N. Y., March 3, 1905.

Mr. FRANK A. FELTS, Oneida, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: In regard to your pouch strap, would say that it is certainly a winner for the comfort of the carriers, equalizing the weight on both shoulders without pressure on the lungs.

Fraternally, yours,

N. EARNEST SPENCER,
Carrier No. 7, Elmira, N. Y.

NOVEMBER 10, 1906.

Mr. C. A. LEE, Oneida, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: It is with much pleasure that I, as one of the carriers in the Oneida post-office, add my name to the list of testimonials relative to the good qualities of "the Felts shoulder strap." Having used the Felts shoulder strap for the past eight months, I certainly can not speak in too high terms of its superiority over any other strap on the market to-day. For ease and convenience in carrying a heavy load it is not excelled, for it equalizes the weight on the whole body instead of one certain spot, as is the case with all other straps used by Uncle Sam's employees to-day.

I would not be without the Felts strap for fifty times its cost.

Yours, very truly,

PETER E. BIRD,
Letter Carrier No. 2, Oneida Post-Office.

ONEIDA, N. Y., November 10, ——.

Mr. C. A. LEE.

DEAR SIR: I have used the Felts shoulder strap for several months, and would not part with it for the price of ten straps if I could not replace it. It equalizes the weight of the load of mail on both shoulders, and it is much easier to carry a heavy load with a Felts shoulder strap than the one furnished by the Post-Office Department. It also minimizes the wear on a carrier's clothes.

Yours, truly,

LEO G. WIXSON,
Substitute Carrier.

ELMIRA, N. Y., March 3, 1906.

Mr. FRANK A. FELTS, Oneida, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: In regard to your pouch strap, I would say cheerfully, "It is the best ever," and the carrier's friend.

JOHN CRUNSE, No. 12.

ELMIRA, N. Y., February 8, 1906.

Mr. FRANK A. FELTS, Oneida, N. Y.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have tried your shoulder strap and think it is immense. I could carry a heavy load with double the ease of the old-fashioned arrangement. With best wishes for your success.

I am, yours,

M. BRETT,
Carrier 23, Elmira, N. Y.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I shall before I take my seat again invoke the point of order, which I hope the Chair will sustain. However, I would say just a word upon the merits of the amendment. The amendment would permit the letter carriers to use any kind of a strap which they might desire to use, irrespective of departmental supervision or approval. The language of the amendment is broad enough to quite cover what I have suggested it would cover. There ought to be some sort of uniformity in the character of straps and satchels used by more than 25,000 employees in the service. If you adopt this amendment, it will enable one carrier to take a piece of rope if he desires and use that for his strap, and another one to use a basket or other method for carrying his load. That may be said to be the business of the carrier who must carry the load, and let him answer for the method. But the service, Mr. Chairman, has for many years been developing along lines of uniformity of administration. The Department now has ample authority for the purchase of this or any other strap after it has given the subject care and consideration. The appropriations are under the authority of law for the making of contracts for these supplies, leaving to the Department under the direction of the head of that service the investigation and test of the better devices and methods of meeting the burdens which are placed upon the carriers.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] yield for a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I yield.

Mr. TAWNEY. If this provision is adopted, the rule of uniformity now prescribed by the Department would be varied only to the extent that a carrier would obtain at his own expense a strap that would afford him more comfort and convenience than the one which is furnished by the Government. So that the "rope" question would not possibly be an objection, because no one would substitute a less convenient method than that furnished by the Department.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that the exhibition before the committee of what is regarded as a very excellent device is very fascinating. I do not know when the gentleman from New York was first introduced to this strap; but it has been familiar to me since early last summer, and at my request it was called to the attention of the First Assistant Postmaster-General to see if it would not be advisable to consider bids for its purchase; but the contract then under negotiation was let, and the price fixed by the owners of this strap was too high, in the judgment of the Department, and the strap was not accepted.

Now, are we, by an amendment to the law, to relieve the owners of this particular strap, who have failed to make good in competitive bids, and provide that the carrier may be importuned by the owners of the device and persuaded to purchase it at his own cost? I have no doubt but that this and other devices will be considered from time to time as contracts shall be let, and I hope to see improvements made and the purchase of those devices which will relieve to the utmost the burden upon the carrier. He deserves the aid of the Department, Mr. Chairman. He is entitled to the machinery of that great service to discover devices for his relief. Are we to withdraw that aid and to put upon his shoulders not only the burden of the mail, but necessitate him meeting the importunities of all sorts and characters of salesmen for their devices?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist upon his point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes, Mr. Chairman; I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The matter is very clear. The amendment proposes a change of existing law, in violation of the rule. The point of order is therefore sustained.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 25, line 24, after the word "dollars," add the following:
"Provided, That no part of this appropriation of $90,000 shall be expended for straps unless letter carriers are permitted to use other straps than those supplied by the Government, if they prefer them, and buy and pay for them out of their own money and at no expense to the Government."

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order against that amendment. It is subject to the same rule.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that this is not subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Indiana desires to be heard on the point of order, the Chair will first hear him.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I merely want to direct the attention of the Chair to the general law, which puts in the hands of the Postmaster-General authority to purchase these supplies according to his best judgment. Under the act of March 2, 1889, the law provides:

The Postmaster-General may, when in his judgment the good of the service so requires, make contract for necessary supplies for the free-delivery service for a period of four years.

This amendment now offered is to permit the use of straps other than those which the law authorizes the Postmaster-General to purchase.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It is not as broad as that.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is the very language.

Mr. DRISCOLL. It is a limitation on this appropriation.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I realize, Mr. Chairman, that the doctrine of limitation on appropriations is exceedingly broad and elastic, but I do not think that a limitation which, however circuitous the windings of its devices, can be framed where it really would be of any force unless the law were changed.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the Chair to page 356 of the Manual, and to this ruling in the Fifty-eighth Congress. It reads as follows:

While it is not in order on an appropriation bill to require lettering on public vehicles, it is in order to withhold the appropriation from all not lettered.

Now, following that, it would not be in order to offer an amendment that would require that these straps—the Felts straps—be used; but it is in order to withhold appropriations for the purchase of straps which are not double straps, or Felts straps, like this. Now, the greater power includes the less; and if this House has the power to limit the appropriation to the purchase of these Felts straps, certainly it has the power to permit some of these to be used on the election of the men themselves, and it seems to me that it is a clear limitation and not new legislation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while the amendment offered is in the form of a limitation, it seems to me, as a matter of fact, to be a change of law. The law now provides how straps shall be purchased. That is a matter confided to the control of the Postmaster-General. The proposition now is to change that method of providing straps, and authorize the carriers to purchase straps themselves.

No doubt Congress can refuse to make an appropriation for the purpose of carrying out the existing law. They can limit the appropriation in any way they please; but I take it that in limiting the appropriation they can not change the law. We can say, "We will not appropriate," but, as I understand it, we can not say, "We will not appropriate unless the Postmaster-General shall violate the existing law." And that is what this amounts to. It indirectly accomplishes a change of law, because if that provision goes into the bill it will be taken as a direction by the Postmaster-General that Congress has changed the law giving to him the power over the purchase of straps and taken away that power from him and given to the carriers themselves the power over the purchase of straps.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I should like to ask the gentleman if he can distinguish between this amendment submitted by me and the ruling that I have referred him to, at page 356 of the Manual, where Congress was not permitted to say that all vehicles must be lettered, but it was permitted to say that no money should be spent for vehicles which were not lettered? That is the same question as this.

Mr. MANN. The distinction is just as broad as the Capitol is wide, and the gentleman himself, who is a good student of parliamentary law, would recognize the distinction if he had not offered the amendment. There was no proposition to change the law in the precedent which the gentleman cites.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Were not those things furnished by the Department?

Mr. MANN. That is a matter absolutely in charge of the Government, and no doubt Congress could say here that there should be no strap provided unless it was lettered so and so; but the law now provides who shall have control of the purchase of straps, and the gentleman's amendment proposes absolutely to change that law. It is what it is there for. It is not there for the purpose of limiting the appropriation. It is not there for the purpose of putting a limit in any way upon the expenditure of the appropriation. It is not expected to have anything to do with the appropriation. The gentleman's amendment is offered, under the guise of a limitation, for the purpose of changing the law, and hence is and ought to be obnoxious to the rule, in my judgment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there any law saying that the carriers shall use such and such a strap?

Mr. MANN. There is a law providing that the straps for carriers shall be purchased by the Department, and that they shall be used under regulations of the Department.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is no law saying that a particular form of strap shall be used?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is governed by regulation?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; the law provides that the Postmaster-General by contract shall purchase the straps and furnish them to the carriers.

Mr. OVERSTREET. And under that law contracts are made for four-year terms. A new contract was made this last fall or the first of the present year.

Mr. DRISCOLL. But this does not affect the making of that contract.

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; but the amendment is obnoxious to the rule which provides that you can not legislate on this bill.

Mr. DRISCOLL. How can it affect the rule or the action of the Department? The Department can buy these straps just the same and go on furnishing them just the same. All we ask is that the individual carriers be permitted to buy these straps or other straps if they want to pay for them and use them. It is simply an alternative. It does not change the functions or duties of the Postmaster-General. It simply says that in a particular case a man may buy a strap and pay for it. It strikes me it is entirely a limitation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is there any law saying that the carrier must wear the straps which the Federal Government buys for him, or that he shall do it?

Mr. DRISCOLL. I do not think there is any such law. I have not found any.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think that helps to elucidate it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to say that the law now required the use of certain straps.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The law, in effect, places the power in the hands of the Postmaster-General and directs him to make the purchase under four years' contract. This amendment permits the purchase by the carrier, notwithstanding the Postmaster-General's selection. The law is as follows:

The Postmaster-General may, whenever in his judgment the good of the service so requires, make contracts for the necessary supplies for the free-delivery service for a period not exceeding four years.

Under that law a contract has been made and the kind of strap has been chosen. Now, this amendment seeks to give to the carrier the right to choose another strap, a strap other than the one the Postmaster-General has purchased under the contract authorized by the law of March 2, 1889. In other words, Mr. Chairman, the effect of the law is that the Postmaster-General takes the responsibility, conferred upon him by the law, relative to the contracts for the straps and their distribution. The amendment seeks to give the carrier the privilege of selecting for himself, even at his own expense, whatever strap he may care to purchase. I can not read that amendment in any way at all without its being construed that, no matter what the law is, the carrier may select and pay for his own strap. There is nothing in that amendment which gives the approval even to the Postmaster-General. Regardless of the law, he may select and purchase whatever strap he pleases, while the law directs the Postmaster-General, under the contract, to purchase straps for the carrier. It may be in form a limitation, but it lacks the substance.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, the law does provide that the Postmaster-General may prescribe the kind of uniform that is used by the men, but it does not prescribe or say anything about the strap. The section that has been read simply provides that the Postmaster-General may buy supplies, but it does not mention straps. Congress has been appropriating for supplies year after year, and the Department has bought supplies year after year. Among those supplies are straps. The men furnish their own uniform, and, therefore, the Department prescribes the kind of uniform that they must wear; but it has never prescribed the strap except by buying it—a single strap worn over the right shoulder.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, there is no law, or at least I have not heard of any, that says that a letter carrier shall wear the strap that the Government furnishes. I know of no law that says he shall not buy a strap and wear it. He may be a hunchback, he may be lame, he may have only one arm, or be otherwise deformed, and I say that law and conscience and fair consideration would not force him to wear any sort of a strap that the Government might buy. Let him go and buy what suits his own back, what suits his own shoulder, what suits his condition, and let him hang up in the garret the one that the Government buys that does not suit his condition. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The question is a fairly close one; but it seems to the Chair that there is this distinction between this case and the one which has been cited concerning the lettering of vehicles. In that instance there was no law requiring that vehicles should be lettered or prohibiting it; but it was in the discretion of the Department having charge of the vehicles. The proposition which in that case was sustained as in order, as a limitation upon the appropriation, did not control that discretion or change the law. It simply withheld the appropriation for vehicles that were not lettered.

The Chair understands that there is a law on the subject, which vests in the Postmaster-General the authority to provide the paraphernalia which shall be worn by letter carriers. The Chair thinks that this provision, if enacted into law, would be held, and quite properly be construed, by the Postmaster-General, as requiring him to permit the use of straps in the discretion of the carriers themselves, which he is not now required to do. If so, it would not be merely a limitation, but would give him a legal authority, which he does not now possess. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows.

For facing slips, plain and printed, including the furnishing of paper for same; and for card slide labels, blanks, and books of an urgent nature, $60,000.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "facing slips," line 10, page 26, insert: "and slips for the distribution of weather forecasts on rural free-delivery routes."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is clear that this is subject to the point of order, but will hear the gentleman from Louisiana if he desires to be heard.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the Chair has considered the question, but I ask permission to divert from this and read something which I have hastily prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana reserve his point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. WATKINS. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman:

"WHAT IS TO COME."

I.

Upon this floor the other day
The honorable Mr. CLARK
Held Republicans to the light,
And made their party look quite dark.

II.

"Omnis Gallia in tres partes, Divisa est." we heard him say;
Then into one of the parties
He plunged his two-edged sword to slay.

III.

The "Grand Old Party" is not dead;
The Elephant still has his trunk;
His goods are packed safely away,
Consisting of his flimflam junk.

IV.

At the bottom, prosperity;
On the top they are mostly nix;
All around is adversity,
In the middle of a bad fix.

V.

The tariff is to be reformed;
Hoarded gold is to be dug up;
And a lot of official pap
Will be thrown to the party pup.

VI.

Railroads are to be controlled;
Rebates come to a speedy end;
The thirty-million fine be paid;
The people have a trusted friend.

VII.

Before all this shall come to pass,
The Elephant's trunk, now so full,
Fastened with Democratic rope,
Will be given a hearty pull.

VIII.

His tail will have to get a twist;
He must be punched with a prod,
And must be punished fore and aft
With a stout Democratic rod.

IX.

A Cannon must be first shot off;
Fair banks must then be tunneled through;
The skies must change their azure Hughes,
And Billy Taft put up the dough.

X.

The people must all go to sleep,
Until Gabriel blows his horn;
Americans must sure forget
That William J. was ever born.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon his point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriting machines, envelope-opening machines, and computing machines, and for the purchase of copying presses, numbering machines, and miscellaneous articles purchased and furnished directly to the postal service, $105,000.

Mr. WILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. One day last week I listened with astonishment to the speech of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY]. As is the habit with a multitude of Republican politicians, they conceal from their view the needs of the people and the errors of their party, and then in beautiful, glowing generalities endeavor to beguile the simple voter into believing that black is white and that panic is joyful prosperity. This may have been possible under peculiar conditions in the past, but I am profoundly convinced that in the face of hard facts and dire need even the artful sophistry of Republican past masters can not longer deceive the people. Standing upon the floor of the House with a carefully prepared manuscript in his hand, showing that his remarks were the result of deliberate thought and not the flight of passing fancy, the distinguished gentleman from Indiana stated:

This Republican panic lasted three months; the Democratic panic lasted forty-eight months, just sixteen times longer than the Republican panic. The panic is over now and the country will soon be over the panic.

This statement, made in all seriousness, brought several Members of the House to their feet. The gentleman from Indiana was requested to state the exact date at which the panic terminated, as a great many people in the country labor under the delusion that it is still on. He answered that it ended just three months and one day from the time it started in; and he accounted for the fact that so many people throughout the country are still out of employment by stating that it was because of the necessity of these people making other arrangements, now that they have satisfied the money centers of New York, so that they can get the money with which to continue business. Then the following colloquy took place:

Mr. WILLETT. I will ask the gentleman if he does not consider that the large number of men now unemployed is one of the elements of the panic.

Mr. CHANEY. It is not one of the elements of the panic, but simply one of the results of the panic.

Mr. WILLETT. So, then, the gentleman will have us to understand, when he says that the panic ceased in three months after its inception or beginning, that the panic itself is separate and apart from the results and that we are now suffering the results.

Mr. CHANEY. I mean you to understand that I said that the panic is over and we will soon be over the panic.

Mr. WILLETT. That does not mean anything to me unless you connect the panic with results. A panic means nothing unless we have results. It is the results of the panic that are affecting the people of this country and that is what we are talking about. Now, if you do not mean the effect of the panic on the people, why do you not say so, and say that the results are still upon us and we are still suffering from them and that the cause has ceased?

Mr. CHANEY. I thought I had said something like that for the benefit of the gentleman. I simply said that the panic is over. There are a few places here and there where the effects of that panic will be felt until those people can adjust their conditions and get business going again.

Mr. WILLETT. And you, as a Member of this House, would stand up in front of the bread line in New York City, where thousands of men every night are trying to get stale bread, and tell them, "Gentlemen, the panic is over." Is that what you mean?

Mr. CHANEY. No; I would not go to New York at all, because we are very much afraid of that place.

Mr. WILLETT. You do not have to go to New York, you can go to any large city. But the condition in New York to-day is such as has never been seen in its history before.

Mr. CHANEY. I do not know about that.

Mr. WILLETT. That is what I want to find out, whether you know about it.

This colloquy fairly illustrates the state of mind of a large number of the Republican Representatives who would have the country understand, if it were possible, that the trouble is all over and it is simply a matter of trifling adjustment when prosperous conditions will return. How perfectly absurd it is for a public speaker, before an intelligent audience, to declare that the panic, the distressing effects of which every one of us feels, does not exist. And then, how unreasonable it is, when hard pressed, to sidestep the whole proposition by stating that the panic has ceased and terminated, but the results are still with us. A panic, in the common acceptance of the term, means more than the sudden collapse of public confidence. It means the continued unrest and lack of stability in financial affairs. What need we care for a panic if the bank in which our funds are deposited immediately opens, or the merchant with whom we deal continues to extend credit, or the firm with whom we are employed continues our employment? Panics may come and panics may go, but they will have no biting effect upon us; but if the bank in which our funds are deposited, along with a score of other banks in our city, closes its doors and refuses to honor our drafts and continues closed until this time; if the merchant with whom we deal refuses to extend to us credit, and if our employer is still unable to give us work, would you have me understand that the panic is over? The panic is still on; the full results of this panic are unknown; none but a prophet could tell what they will be. The crisis in some financial institutions may be past, but the panic, in all its unrest, in all its horror, and in all its heart-breaking reality, is still present in the workshop, the store, the office, and the home. Covering up with a multitude of words the extreme need of our constituents will not assist us in affording them relief. Using an expression which the creator of the panic delights to use, "Let us turn on the light," and see what havoc he has wrought. I am not surprised that the meddlesome Republican President and the time-serving politicians desire with all their hearts and brains to cover up and conceal the wrecks which a fantastic and mischievous Chief Executive has wrought. If what we observe in labor circles and in workingmen's homes is an indication that the panic has stopped, we can then understand something of the spirit of the Irishman's remarks when he said, after falling from the roof of a five-story building, that "he did not mind so much the fall as he did the stopping."

There seems to be a conspiracy of silence on the part of the Republican Members of this House on the subject of the cause and effect of the present panic. They have spoken so often to the text "With the Republican party is prosperity and with the Democratic party is panic" that they are at a loss for appropriate words to express their true feelings. They dare not attack the President for fear of his big stick. And why should they? In all fairness, Members who went home to their districts, each with a little piece of the "Roosevelt halo" pinned to the lapel of his coat, and appealed to their constituents to return them to Congress so that the Roosevelt halo could be restored to the President's brow perfect and complete—how can they, in all decency, now come out and condemn and abandon their preserver when he is reaping the reward of his own reckless misconduct? Two years ago business men in this country referred to the President's talk as oratory; now, facetiously, they refer to it as a display of cheap dentistry.

Notwithstanding the fact that the President is a usurper, in that he attempts to control all branches of government.

Notwithstanding the fact that he is imperialistic and arbitrary in his methods and manners, as evidenced by his reference to the constitution of Cuba, an instrument which our Government had helped to frame, on September 28, 1906, when he telegraphed to Secretary Taft, with reference to adjustment of Cuban affairs: "I do not care in the least that such an agreement is unconstitutional." An ancient maxim of benevolent despotism was, "Let my subjects say what they like so long as I do what I like;" but even this privilege is not granted "my people," for we have learned in many different cases that he who differs from our President finds himself involved in great difficulties.

Notwithstanding the President has taken over the supervision of about the whole of life. Though not a lawyer, he criticises the decisions of the United States Supreme Court; though not a business man and never having been engaged in a profitable personal business, he undertakes to direct the most minute details of the business world.

Notwithstanding the President would have "my people" appeal to him personally on every subject. Should a trust be prosecuted? "Ask me," says the President, not the Attorney-General. Should we have other legislation with reference to railroads? "Ask me," and not Congress. Should football be played at the universities? "Ask me," not the faculty.

Notwithstanding his imperialistic methods, as evidenced by the un-American discharge of whole companies of American soldiers without trial, without proof of guilt—a thing which can hardly be realized as possible in America—it sounds more like the edict of an African chieftain or Russian despot than the command of an American President. As evidenced by the suspension of the Mississippi River steamboat pilot, which is also fresh in the minds of all American people and is another demonstration that illustrated the trend of our President's mind.

Notwithstanding the President has done more than all other Presidents and all other public men in the history of the country to shake the confidence of the people in our form of government, and has done more than any one man in our nation's history to destroy legitimate business, shatter confidence among the people, and bring utter panic into every countingroom, factory, shop, office, and home in the land, and has exhibited a greater degree of self-consciousness and egotism, which are the natural results of power and flattery, than any President who has occupied the White House.

Nevertheless, the clarion tongues of the great Republican party are silent; the people's rights may be trampled upon, but party interests must be protected. We hear no protest from them. Occasionally a reckless one steps out and cries: "Peace, peace!" but he soon learns there is no peace.

Since we have become a world power, as described by President Roosevelt, the characteristic conditions of imperialism have been appearing in our own country.

I will recite some of them: It magnifies the executive power; it acts upon the passions of the people; conciliates them in classes and localities by lavish expenditure; it occupies men's minds with display and amusement; it inspires a thirst for military glory; it captures the electorate by false assertions and illusory promises, and then, having by these means obtained control, it crushes opposition and extinguishes liberty. And the irony of the thing is this: That all this is done in the name of the people themselves and under the authority of their voice, so that the people, while boasting of their supreme power, are enslaved. Ask yourselves whether these conditions exist in our country. If the usurpations as I have described pass unchallenged by the people of America, they will soon create the force of precedent. Now is the time, and we are the people to watch with jealousy such beginnings, to indignantly attack them, and, if possible, to destroy them. Wiser words were never spoken than those of President Cleveland: "It is not the business of a government to support its people, but of the people to support the government." The people must fight their own battles for better conditions.

Every time they call upon that great central deity, the President, to fight an evil, they surrender their God-given right to grow strong by fighting it themselves.

By and by, if recent tendencies continue, they will surrender all their duties and all their rights, so dearly bought, to their rulers.

By and by the Government, like that of Germany, will dog the citizen's footsteps at every turn, provide him with old-age pensions, recompense him for all injuries received through negligence, destroy his manhood while alive, and bury him when dead.

After the colloquy that took place between the gentleman from Indiana and myself, and to which I referred a moment ago, I find that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] made some remarks referring to the financial situation in New York.

The gentleman is a Republican and represents one of the New York City districts and should be informed of the true situation in New York. His remarks indicate that he is entirely ignorant of the true situation as it there exists. He says that he has sent out 51,000 letters to his constituents, which letters I understand contained an expression of willingness on his part to assist his constituents in any way in his power, and that of the appeals from men out of work he received fewer than thirty. He also states, for the purpose of indicating further the true situation among the working people in New York City, that the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor has investigated the condition of the homeless men and reports that less than 1 per cent of the homeless men in New York City would work if they could get it, and also, as a further indication of the situation in New York City, he states that for the month of January the postal receipts fell off about 6 per cent as compared with last year, and for the month of February, leaving out the extra day, that the receipts fell off less than 3 per cent, and then in the full flush of his manly independence he declares, "We are not asking any help in New York City or appealing for any charity and do not want anybody's sympathy and have not asked anybody for a public collection." How is that for Republican independence and Republican prosperity? I understand these declarations were greeted with loud applause on the part of the Republican Representatives in the House. Now, let us thoughtfully and deliberately analyze the statements made by my distinguished colleague, Mr. BENNET. In the first place, he says that he wrote 51,000 letters, and that he has received less than thirty applications for work from men who would work if they had it, and that he secured employment for these applicants. What is the logical inference to be drawn from this statement? The inference Mr. BENNET would have you draw is that in the city of New York all men who are willing to work have employment. The difficulty with this statement and the inference drawn from it is that it in no way gives a fair indication of the number of unemployed in the city of New York.

In my own district I have not had more than about fifty direct personal appeals for employment; but without the slightest exaggeration I say to you, as a result of careful investigation, that there are at least 10,000 men in my district who are able and willing to work, but are unemployed. It is therefore perfectly clear that the number of appeals made to him from New York personally is no fair indication of the number of unemployed in his district nor in the city of New York. He submits to us a report of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor upon the condition of homeless men. Any reference I made to the unemployed in the city of New York had no reference to the tramp or ordinary loafer found on the streets of a great city, but did have reference directly to men with homes, men with trades, and men who are willing to work, but could not find it, and these are the men who are numbered not by tens of thousands, but by hundreds of thousands in the city of New York to-day. I sat in the council room of the board of estimate and apportionment when representatives of the unemployed were before the mayor and board requesting that certain public improvements be commenced so that the great army of unemployed men who are on the streets of New York looking for work could find employment, and it was there stated that over 250,000 men were in the city of New York seeking employments. I have in my hand at least fifty letters from labor unions in the city of New York, and they tell the story that between 75 and 90 per cent of union labor in New York City is now unemployed. I desire to read extracts from a few of these letters to simply inform you as to the true condition.

The secretary of the Emmet Association of Rock Drillers and Tool Sharpeners says:

> The trade that we represent is in bad state at present. Out of 1,300 men we have about 150 men working at present, and the condition in the other trades is just as bad as in our trade, and the prospects are very poor. I have been talking to mostly all of the secretaries of different trades, and we figure that 187,000 men are idle in New York.

Mr. Daniel Harris, secretary of the cigar makers' joint label committee of New York, writes:

> In our trade there are about 3,000 unemployed and about 7,000 working about half time.

The secretary of the Stone Masons, No. 74, of New York City, writes:

> Out of a membership of 2,000 men there are less than 200 employed, and this condition has prevailed for four months past, with no prospects for change for better conditions. Other unions report 90 per cent of other trades are idle and the condition of their families the worst they have ever experienced.

Mr. William B. O'Neill, secretary of the Wholesale Dry Goods Teamsters' Local No. 708, New York City, says:

> Forty-five per cent of our members are unemployed, and such has been the condition of affairs for the last five months. Our organization in New York and vicinity consists of thirty local unions, and the same can be said of our affiliated locals. Men who have not been idle in twenty years are walking the streets at the present time unable to find work. We received the same report from all our locals throughout the country, and from reports the prospects do not look any brighter at present.

Mr. E. J. Gibbons, secretary of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, says:

We have 2,000 men unemployed and have been for some time. We have never seen the conditions of labor in our branch so distressing as they are this year.

Mr. C. H. Bauscher, secretary of United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, Bronx Borough committee, says:

It has not been so dull in the entire building industry as it has been since last October since 1893. In consequence 60 to 70 per cent of the building trades mechanics and laborers have been and still are out of work. I will refer to the carpenters in particular. We have between 18,000 and 19,000 carpenters in our organization, and according to reliable information from the various carpenters' locals 60 to 70 per cent is a very conservative figure of our trades unemployed.

Mr. P. E. Farrell, secretary of the United Housesmiths and Bridgemen of New York City and vicinity, says:

Conditions have not been as bad in the building industry at this time of the year in over twenty years, and the outlook is very gloomy for the near future. Fully one-half, if not more, of the members of this organization of 4,000 are idle at present.

Mr. J. E. Pritchard, general secretary of the International Union of Pavers, Rammermen, Flaggers, Bridge and Stone Curb Setters, says:

We have in the neighborhood of 2,000 members and can safely say that in the past three months there has not been 100 of those members working. This does not include hundreds of other men not affiliated with this union who are also idle.

Mr. W. A. Coakley, president of the International Protective Association of Lithographic Apprentices and Press Feeders of New York, says:

Our association in this city has more members out of work at this time than they ever had for the past nine years (my term of office), and it has been so for the past four months, and what I say of this trade can be truthfully said of any other trade in this city.

Mr. Edward J. Duffy, general secretary of the United Association of Journeymen Plumbers and Gas Fitters, Local No. 498, of New York City, says:

This local union, with a membership of 1,000, has 35 per cent of its members out of work at the present time. This condition has prevailed in the plumbing and gas-fitting industry for the past six months, with no immediate prospect of a change for the better. I may add that not in ten years have there been so many unemployed in the building industry in this city.

Mr. M. Zuckerman, general secretary of the United Cloth, Hat, and Cap Makers of North America, says:

The number of unemployed in our trade amounts to-day to about 75 per cent.

I will not weary you with further citations of reports from other labor organizations, as those I have mentioned include a sufficient variety of trades to fairly show the distressing labor conditions in the city of New York. Of course, these reports give no record of the unemployed who are not members of labor organizations, but from the labor organization reports a fair inference can be drawn of the number of nonunion unemployed. The gentleman from New York would have us understand from the fact that the post-office reports indicate a falling off of only 6 per cent in January and 1 per cent in February that the business conditions were sound and unaffected by the financial depression which is now upon us.

The condition of these reports, upon a very slight investigation, shows that business houses which during the times of prosperity had very little advertising are, during these times of panic and difficulty, doing a very large amount of it, therefore increasing the returns of the Post-Office Department materially, thereby affecting any falling off because of bad business conditions. But how fruitless is such discussion in the face of these labor reports.

Before I take my seat, I desire to call the attention of the House to a little amusing incident which occurred a few days ago. A foreign-born citizen, one of the children of sunny Italy, who came to this country and is trying to make a home for himself and secure a standing in the community in which he lives, and one who also is the councellor of a great many of his own countrymen, had quite a considerable sum of money on deposit in one of the Brooklyn banks during the first stages of our financial difficulty. He was about to withdraw his money, but listening to the counsels of the President, he allowed his money to remain, with the result that the bank has since failed and the probability is that in the final adjustment he will lose considerable money. He had an interview with me and suggested that he had a proper case against the President of the United States, but I explained to him that it was impossible for him to sue the President; that the President was one of our citizens who practically says anything and does anything he pleases without personal responsibility.

I have been repeatedly asked which bill now before the House and Senate I approve as the measure best adapted to restore confidence among the business men and remedy our defective financial system. I am satisfied that there is no bill before Congress which, if enacted into law, would accomplish this result, but, on the other hand, I am assured by bankers all over the country that if any one of them was adopted conditions would be worse.

Remove the cause of the unrest, silence the ceaseless, senseless clamor for spectacular effect on the part of the man in the White House and quiet will be restored.

The business men of the country are like the inhabitants of a country village turned out to see and hear a passing show—new wonders captivate their attention, new feats of daring are being performed before their eyes.

Let the business world shake off the slavery created by the methods of one man during the past few years, assert their independence and disregard the Niagara of verbal protest made by the President against malefactors of great wealth, which has become a mania with him.

Tell him that we have a Department of Justice for the purpose of prosecuting malefactors of great wealth, malefactors of little wealth, and malefactors of no wealth.

Tell him that his high office must not be used for the striking down of any class of our citizens—rich or poor, high or low.

Tell him that the multitude of unemployed in all our large cities are calling their empty dinner pails "Teddy bears" as a token of appreciation for their creator.

Tell him that he is not like Washington or Lincoln; they brought order and rest out of discord, while he has produced discord and unrest out of peace and prosperity.

Tell him to step back out of the spot light in the center of the stage and give the people a chance. [Loud applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

To defray expenses incident to the shipment of supplies, including hardware, boxing, packing, cartage, freight, and the pay of one carpenter and three laborers for assignment in connection therewith, $125,000.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, after the word "dollars," in line 3, insert as a new paragraph, the following:

"To cover cost of installing shelving, files, and conveyors in the building occupied by the division of supplies in the city of Washington, D. C., $3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of letter carriers, substitutes for carriers on annual leave, clerks in charge of substations, and tolls and ferriage, rural-delivery service, $35,373,000: Provided, That not to exceed $12,000 of the amount hereby appropriated may be used for compensation of clerks in charge of substations: Provided further, That in the discretion of the Postmaster-General the pay of any carrier on a water route who furnishes his own power boat and is employed during the summer months may be fixed at an amount not exceeding $900 in any one calendar year.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting, after the word "year," on line 14, page 27, the following:

"Provided further, That a sum not to exceed $500,000 of this appropriation may be expended by the Postmaster-General, in cooperation with the Secretary of Agriculture, in improving the conditions of rural delivery routes to be selected by them for the purpose of ascertaining the possible increase in the territory which could be served by one carrier, and the possible increase of the number of delivery days each year, the amount required for proper maintenance in excess of local expenditure for rural delivery routes, and the relative saving to the Government in the maintenance of rural delivery routes by reason of such improvements: Provided further, That the State or county, or counties, which may be selected for improvement of rural delivery routes therein under this provision shall furnish an equal amount of money for the improvement of the rural routes so selected."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that. Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] want to speak to his amendment?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Then, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago in discussing this bill I stated the reasons why I thought this amendment ought to pass the House. On that occasion I said that in my opinion it was subject to the point of order, being new law, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] now makes the point of order. I expressed also the hope at that time that the point of order would be withheld in order that this question, one of such importance as I think it is, could come before the House for settlement, beginning as it does a great internal system of public-road improvements. However, I am aware that it is against the rules of the House, and, if we be not mistaken in the fact, the point of order is well taken. I therefore will have to resort to that other method that I intimated on the day that I discussed this question, in order to obtain a hearing for the people, now denied by the technical rules of the House. I have never thought it a proper thing to discuss at any length an amendment or other proposition which is subject to the motion that has been made by the gentleman from Indiana—that is, to the point of order. I therefore will not take up the time in the discussion of the question, but will ask the gentleman from Indiana if he intends to insist upon the point of order before proceeding further?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I desire to insist upon the point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. If the gentleman insists upon the point of order, I have nothing more to say at this time upon the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment very clearly changes existing law, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, on page 27, line 6, after the word "million," I move to strike out the word "three" and insert the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 6, after "million," strike out "three" and insert "five," so as to read "five hundred."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting at end of line 14, page 27:

"SECTION 1. That beginning July 1, 1908, there shall be a parcels post limited to 11 pounds on every rural route in the United States. Said parcels post shall be confined exclusively to the rural route upon which the parcel originates and its rural-route connections, and shall not extend beyond said route upon which it originates and routes with which said route connects directly, without the intervention of railway mail service, star route, messenger, or any other form of mail service.

"SEC. 2. That the rate of postage on such packages shall be 5 cents for packages weighing not more than 3 pounds, 7 cents for packages weighing not more than 5 pounds, 10 cents for packages weighing more than 5 and not more than 8 pounds, and 15 cents for all packages weighing more than 8 and not more than 11 pounds.

"SEC. 3. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to matter which is classified by law as first, second, and third class, nor affect existing rates of postage thereon; nor shall there be accepted for transportation and delivery, as mail matter, by rural mail carriers, any intoxicating liquors (ardent, vinous, spirituous, or malt), habit-forming drugs, explosives liquids liable to explosion by shock or jar or to spontaneous combustion, or any matter exhaling bad odor, or which from its nature or constituency is liable to contaminate or damage the mails.

"SEC. 4. That the compensation of rural carriers be increased to the extent of all receipts for such parcel-post service hereby established, on each route, respectively, not to exceed $300 per annum to each carrier, to be paid under such rules and regulations as may be established by the Postmaster-General.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Against the amendment the gentleman from Indiana reserves the point of order.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I submitted some remarks to the House in general debate on this question. It is unnecessary, therefore, for me to-day to take very much time in further discussion of it. This amendment is not exactly the bill as introduced by me in the House. It is rather a combination of two bills, one introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], from which the last two sections are taken, and one introduced by myself, which includes the first section, or composes the first section of this amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I criticised in some degree bills offered by other gentlemen here the other day. I criticised the bills fairly. I said the language in one of the bills—that offered by the gentleman from Connecticut—was too loose; that it could not be understood by the courts and administered as the law by the Department. My friend from Connecticut has informed me since that he did not draw it, so I am very glad to take back the apparent criticism of the gentleman himself, but leave the criticism on the bill. The bill the gentleman offered required the size of packages to be of the size of a common suit case. I might call it the "suit-case bill" and not the "Henry bill" any longer. [Applause and laughter.]

I criticised the bill of my friend from Tennessee, or rather the first section of it, for being too general likewise, and I am very much delighted to hear since from him that he did not draw that section. Therefore another good lawyer has been saved to the house. [Laughter.] Something has been said in the newspapers about my criticism of these gentlemen and the looseness of their language. I meant no criticism of them. I merely wanted to suggest to them, and they know it is correct, that in order for a law to stand the test it ought to be like the pasture fences in Georgia—that is, "pig tight, horse high, and bull strong," and this amendment is that way. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Georgia has admitted that the two best sections of his amendment were taken from the bill I introduced [laughter], I feel it my duty to make my proper acknowledgment to him. I wish, further, to state that the first section of the bill that I had introduced, which he criticizes, was drawn by an expert in such matters, and inasmuch as the gentleman from Georgia is one of the most famous experts in postal matters that I know of, I yield ready acceptance to his language. It is results, Mr. Chairman, I am trying to reach, and if the words used get the results, I do not care whether the one or other of the two be used.

But to the merits of the bill which I introduced and the bill which the gentleman introduced and which are now combined in this amendment. It simply provides for the establishment upon rural-delivery routes of a parcels post confined to the rural routes upon which the parcel is mailed, which was recommended as a part of the general recommendation of the Postmaster-General in his last report. I have received numbers of letters from parties opposing the bill. These letters usually come from retail merchants throughout the rural sections where these routes are. This amendment will not injure the retail merchants, but will be of great benefit to them, inasmuch as they will have the exclusive privilege of using the parcels post, and it will be a great benefit to the people who are patrons of these routes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What do you mean by "exclusive privilege?"

Mr. SIMS. When I say "exclusive privilege" I mean this, in reply to the gentleman from Mississippi, that the great department stores in the cities that are not situated upon these routes can not use them, and therefore the retail merchants who are situated upon them can only use them, and in that sense it is an exclusive use.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SIMS. I will in a moment. The opposition has come from retail merchants, as if it was an injury to them, when, in fact, it is of especial benefit to them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why does the gentleman wish to discriminate against the department stores in favor of the retail stores on the routes? Why not give all the privilege alike?

Mr. SIMS. My reply is that the opposition is made by retail merchants situated on these "roots," to use Republican pronunciation [laughter], when in fact this amendment is in their interest.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe it would be possible for a mail-order house, doing business outside of a particular route, to freight its goods to a town within the route, and then, by means of the route, to have them carried by mail to the people living on the route, and thereby destroy the business of the local merchant?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, to ask what is a possibility is one thing; to ask what is practicable or profitable is another thing.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe it would be practicable?

Mr. SIMS. I do not believe the department stores can profitably take advantage of this legislation.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman conceive that a bill like this would do the very thing that he seeks to prevent being done?

Mr. SIMS. Do what?

Mr. MADDEN. To give all the business within the mail route to the large mail-order houses in the big cities and take away from the merchants doing a local business all the business that they could otherwise do.

Mr. SIMS. I do not see how it would be possible under this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. I should like about five minutes more.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, Mr. GRIGGS, Mr. GAINES of Tennessee, and others rose.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I made that motion for the purpose of seeing how many gentlemen would rise and how many amendments were in preparation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that. This is an important matter, and we want to get as much light as possible.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not want to prevent the return of these gentlemen to this House, does he? [Laughter.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I move that all debate on the pending amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not do that. There are several amendments yet to be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not move to close debate on all amendments. The gentleman moves that all debate on the pending amendment close in five minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That does not cut off any other amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent to continue my remarks for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in further reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], I can not conceive how the great department stores in his city could send their goods down into my district or the district of the gentleman from Georgia in such a way as to deprive the merchants there of the benefits intended to be conferred under this section.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Would the gentleman favor a proposition that would permit the department stores to use the parcels post?

Mr. SIMS. I do not want them to use it upon equal terms with the local merchant, because it would destroy the local merchant. The Postmaster-General has not recommended such law.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Then is not the whole proposition wrong? If it is right to apply to the people of one place, is it not right to apply to the people of another place? As far as I am concerned, I am opposed to this whole parcels-post business.

Mr. SIMS. There is a great difference between sending a package on a rural route extending not to exceed 25 miles for 5 cents and sending a similar package of equal weight from San Francisco to my district for 5 cents. A flat parcels post would discriminate absolutely against the local merchant.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman concede the right of mail-order houses to freight their goods to any town in the United States and then mail them at the post-office within that town at the reduced rate to any person living on a rural-delivery route?

Mr. SIMS. No, indeed; and I do not conceive that this amendment provides for that or makes it practically possible.

Mr. MADDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not ask if this amendment provided for it or not. What I wanted to know was whether the gentleman believed that the mail-order merchant could do that under this law.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think so; such is not the intention.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there anything in the law to prevent any citizen of the United States, no matter where he is located, from sending through the mails anything that may be required by any citizen in any rural district?

Mr. SIMS. He can send it but he must pay the rate now prevailing for such a service; he could not get the benefit of the reduced rate under this bill unless mailed originally on the route.

Mr. MADDEN. If he sent it by railroad, by freight, to a town within the route, would he not then have the right to mail it from that town to any point within the route?

Mr. SIMS. Not as I understand it; that would be an evasion; but if he would have such a right we will offer an amendment so as to exclude it. Now, Mr. Chairman, another point. In the parcels-postal service, as recommended by the Postmaster-General, there is no recommendation for additional compensation for the rural carriers. If the service is established, the compensation ought to be reasonably and equitably increased. The bill I introduced, and above referred to, provides that they shall have all of the receipts on the route up to and not exceeding $300 per annum, to be paid under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may make. I would be opposed to putting so heavy a burden on the rural carriers, as recommended by the Postmaster-General, with no additional compensation or increase of salary. As it will be experimental, I thought it was best at first not to have a flat increase, but let the compensation rest on the fees received. I thought it better not to make a flat increase of so many hundred dollars a year, but rather provide that the receipts from the service, for the first year or two, be paid the rural carriers until the service was fully established. This will make the service self-sustaining while in its experimental stage. But, if after being tried, it was found to be self-sustaining, we can then give such a fixed increase of the salaries of carriers as may be warranted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist upon his point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry of my colleague.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed by order of the House. Does the gentleman from Georgia wish to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. GRIGGS. I never care to speak to the court when the court is with me. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood the Chair to say that debate was closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate is closed and a point of order is pending.

Mr. GRIGGS. I presume, by the question the Chair asked the gentleman from Indiana, that the Chair is with me on this question.

The CHAIRMAN. In order to make this perfectly plain, the Chair will again read the rule. Clause 2 of Rule XXI:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriation for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

We have now under consideration a general appropriation bill, and to it this amendment is offered. The amendment makes no appropriation at all. It does change existing law in that it authorizes a new service not now authorized by law.

It has often been held that where there is no law upon the subject an amendment proposing to make law does change existing law, and is therefore in violation of the rule.

In its second section the amendment also changes existing law by making rates of postage on certain articles different from that fixed by the present law. The third section likewise contains provisions at variance with the present law, and, finally, the fourth section changes the existing law fixing the compensation of rural carriers. When such a point of order is made, the Chair must enforce the rule no matter how meritorious the proposed legislation may be. The point of order is therefore sustained.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

> Insert in line 14, page 27, the following:
> "That from and after July 1, 1908, the drop-letter privilege now existing at post-offices not entitled to free-delivery service shall be extended to all rural routes. That this privilege shall be confined strictly to rural routes and shall not extend to the termini thereof. That the postage on all such letters shall be 1 cent for 2 ounces or fraction thereof."

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, at all post-offices where there is no delivery system there is a drop-letter privilege which gives to the people the right to send a letter through the post-office for 1 cent. This is exactly the privilege I wish to see extended to the patrons of rural routes. A rural route is nothing but a traveling post-office. The carrier sells stamps and money orders and registers letters and parcels. He does everything, in short, that any postmaster does. For these and other reasons, which I have not the time to enumerate now, I believe that this amendment ought to be adopted. This will only extend to the farmers along a rural route the same privilege as the town man now enjoys.

The CHAIRMAN. The postage is now fixed by existing law. This proposes to change it, and is therefore in violation of the rule which the Chair has just cited. The point of order is therefore sustained.

Mr. GRIGGS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia offer a further amendment.

Mr. GRIGGS. No, Mr. Chairman; that was the amendment to which I wished to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. Then I take it the gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to speak for the five minutes which he would have used, if the gentleman from Indiana had reserved the point of order. Is there objection?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, debate has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I did not ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Indiana to reserve his point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Not on this last point of order. It seems to me it is practically the same amendment. I desire to be courteous to the gentleman.

Mr. GRIGGS. The gentleman has made the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. GRIGGS. And he will not reserve it?

Mr. OVERSTREET. No; not at this time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will reserve it until I can ask my colleague a question or two about the bill. The gentleman closed debate a few moments ago, and now here he is shutting off debate again.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have been very liberal to the gentleman from Tennessee, I think.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I know the gentleman has, because the gentleman from Tennessee has always tried to do something right.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "year" in line 14, page 27, add:

"In passing upon petition for the establishment of a rural route, neither the fact that there are gates inclosing farms across the highway over which the same passes nor the fact that a part of the patrons may be supplied by the star-route service shall be considered in determining whether the route shall be established."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order or reserve the point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will reserve it.

Mr. OVERSTREET. We must finish this bill some time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is an entirely new proposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, is it not a fact that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto has been closed?

The CHAIRMAN. Only upon the amendment pending when the motion was made.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the motion of the gentleman from Indiana was to close debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion was changed to include a single amendment.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I will reserve the point of order with this notice, that I shall insist upon continuing under the rules strictly, after the gentleman has spoken for five minutes, not only upon this, but upon all other amendments which I think are honestly subject to a point of order. I do this in the interest of the time of all gentlemen who are anxious to conclude this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves the point of order.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. Chairman, I think there is much in this amendment that should be considered. In the first place, I desire to state to the House that down South, especially in my State, we have what is called "stock-law" districts all over that country. One part of the county is in the stock-law section, and the other is out of it. This necessitates the construction of gateways on all roads crossing the boundary line between the two. In my own county there are a number of such districts. Now, the Department has adopted the unjust rule of denying the establishment of the rural service on highways obstructed by these gates, however necessary they may be for the protection of the crops, or however willing the carrier may be to assume the trouble of passing the gates, or however much the rural service may be needed on the route. In going a trip of 25 miles in length the carriers do not object to two or more of these gateways. Then why should the Department object? It certainly will not be contended that opening these gates would endanger the mail or materially impair the service. This is simply a fad of the Department, under which hundreds of routes have been turned down in the State of Mississippi, as well as in other States. Hence I can see no reason why the amendment to that extent should not be adopted.

The next proposition involved in the amendment is intended to cure another, I think, unjust rule of the Department. That is denying the rural service because a few of the patrons may be supplied by the star-route carriers. This often denies many people off the star route any kind of delivery service, while those on the route will not accept this kind of service, for the reason that nine out of ten of the star-route carriers in the South are unfit to handle the mail. The carrier is generally a thoughtless, ignorant negro or white boy, and the citizens along the route will not intrust them with the mail. Then, too, the star-route service does not give them many of the benefits resulting from the rural-delivery service. For instance, the star-route carrier can not sell postage nor can he register a letter nor can he sell money orders. In this manner it seems that the farmers who live in communities through which the star route passes are to be always denied the benefits of the rural-delivery service. Is this right? Can it be justified from any standpoint of reason?

In view of these facts, I do insist that my friend [Mr. OVERSTREET] having charge of this bill will withdraw his point of order and permit the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have lost a great many routes from the same reason down in my country. The gentleman has shut off debate, so we can not lay our complaints before the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk to be read the following extract from an editorial article in a paper called "The Truth Seeker," published in the city of New York:

FOR A NATIONAL CONFESSION OF FAITH.

The New York Sun, which is one of Roosevelt's severest critics, basing its hostility to the President on the ground of his recreancy to the Constitution, calls on the National Congress to pass the bill introduced by Representative MOORE of Pennsylvania, for the restoration to our coin of the motto, "In God we trust," which Mr. Roosevelt caused to be removed.

With pious unction, which we never gave the Sun credit for, that newspaper says: "We hope that so much of the bill as aims to renew the former declaration of dependence upon divine Providence, and to replace on our coins of silver and gold the time-honored motto recently stricken therefrom by Executive order, will be reported promptly by Congress and be passed at the earliest possible opportunity by the House and Senate."

There is more in the Sun's article about "faith that is quickened in dark days of national trial," with the surmise that "even the wholly godless," who "must form an inconsiderable part of the entire population," will in Rooseveltian times welcome the reappearance of the old motto.

Here the Sun is altogether in error. Many of the godless, in view of his extreme religiosity and his boasted distribution of offices according to religious denomination, are not in any sense enamored of Mr. Roosevelt, but they look upon his removal of that unconstitutional, untruthful, and unwarranted deific motto from our coinage as one of the most sensible acts ever performed by a President. They do not trust in God. They know that nobody else does who is sane, and therefore they do not see why every coin issuing from our mints should carry forth to the world an official lie.

Mr. Chairman, there is much more of the same sort in the article referred to, but what has been read is sufficient for the purposes of this address. The whole tone of the article is one of defiance to the popular belief of the people of the United States in the existence of a Supreme Being. In addition to this article, since the introduction of my bill for the restoration of the motto to the coin of the country, have come a few—happily a very few—letters and circulars from atheists and freethinkers protesting against the recognition by the Government of the propriety of the motto "In God we trust."

At the same time, in greater volume, have come letters from sincere wellwishers of the institutions of the country, pleading for the restoration of the motto and expressing the fear that its removal by Executive order would be interpreted as evidencing a national depreciation of divine authority.

Firmly convinced of the error of those who have misconstrued the purport of the President's order, but in response to a wholesome public sentiment, the bill to which my name is attached was introduced. It was the third of many others directed to the same purpose. The first bill was presented early in the session by my colleague, Mr. JAMES, of Kentucky, a Democrat, and shortly thereafter Mr. SHEPPARD, of Texas, another Democrat, who supported his measure in a brilliant speech in this Chamber January 7, also submitted a bill. Democrats and Republicans alike from other sections, voicing the sentiments of their constituencies, presented similar measures, among them Mr. BEALE, of Pennsylvania, a Republican; Mr. ASHBROOK, of Ohio, a Democrat; Mr. WOOD, of New Jersey, a Republican, and, finally, for the purpose of concentrating into a composite measure the gist of the various bills, Mr. MCKINLEY, of Illinois, a Republican and chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures.

It is Mr. McKinley's bill that has been reported by the committee for the favorable action of this House. It embraces the best features of all the bills offered by Republicans and Democruts alike. There is, therefore, no difference of opinion on political grounds. Nor, so far as I can learn, is there any evidence of a desire on the part of anyone to make political capital of the order of the President. On the contrary, the intent of the Executive seems to be thoroughly understood, more especially as the war-time law under which the motto was first placed upon the coin is not mandatory, but gives discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury.

It is worth mentioning, although the history of the motto has been admirably covered in the address of my Texas colleague, Mr. SHEPPARD, that a Pennsylvania minister—Mr. Watkinson—first urged the use of the motto in a letter to Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury in President Lincoln's Cabinet.

What—

He said, writing to the Secretary in 1861—

if our country were now shattered beyond reconstruction? Would not the antiquaries of succeeding centuries rightly reason from our past that we were a heathen nation?

It was a time of great trial, a time which called for a new declaration of faith, a time to which we may fairly apply these thrilling words of the lamented Lincoln:

We have been the recipients of the choicest bounty of heaven; we have been preserved these many years in peace and prosperity; we have grown in numbers, wealth, and power as no nation has ever grown; but we have forgotten God. Intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-reliant to feel the necessities of redeeming and preserving grace; too proud to pray to the God that made us.

It was during such times and under such stress that Mr. Chase directed the superintendent of the mint at Philadelphia, a former governor of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to devise a motto that would signify to every holder of our coin, whether it be used for the present or be preserved through the ages, that this is a God-fearing people, and thus it was the four words, "In God we trust," became the symbol of the faith of our imperiled nation.

The enabling act under which this significant public service was performed, the act of March 3, 1863, provided "it shall be lawful to cause the motto 'In God we trust' to be placed upon such coins hereafter to be issued as shall admit of such legend;" but it did not compel the use of the motto. The act of February 12, 1873, also left it within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, while in subsequent legislation affecting coinage certain provisions have been construed to require specific authority upon the part of Congress to place the motto upon the coin.

It is with the hope that the discretionary power hitherto lodged in the Secretary of the Treasury may have the effect of law that I urge the passage of the bill as reported. Should such a measure be passed by this body of Representatives of the people and be sent on its way to the Chief Magistrate, whose order in this instance has been so unfairly and unwisely distorted, I have no doubt of the answer that will come from that high source to the unwitting challenge of the reckless few. I do not believe any bill, such as is proposed, which shall definitely fix the authority for placing the motto on the coin will fail of the President's approval.

That the President should pander to the atheist or the scoffer is unthinkable of one whose religious tendencies are so pronounced as his and whose faith in divine authority has been so often expressed in public and private utterance. That the scoffer should seize upon an order of the Executive, intended as much to maintain the integrity of religious sentiment as to facilitate and beautify the coinage of the country, is not surprising perhaps, except as it has served to challenge the fundamental principles underlying the strength and perpetuity of our nation.

Had we only to deal with the sacreligious, who, in their blindness, cry out their defiance of the Supreme authority, the question of having the motto on the coin might not invoke the serious attention of Congress, but in these days of enlightenment, when a Presidential deliverance is flashed simultaneously into every corner of the nation, when enterprising newspapers catch up the refrain and millions of minds are set in motion, to magnify or to minimize, the import of every word or act affecting the governmental function becomes portentous. It is because the agitation arising from the use or the nonuse of the motto has been carried into the thousands of churches and schools of every denomination—Jew, Gentile, Catholic, and Protestant—throughout the land that I believe it incumbent upon this body to pass upon this question promptly and with emphasis. I believe we should order the motto back upon the coin so that it may be heralded throughout the nations, as far as the coin of the United States shall circulate, and as long as it shall endure, that the American people reverently and unswervingly place their trust in Almighty God.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, has the point of order been passed upon?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not yet been made, the Chair will say.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BOUTELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. R. 69. Joint resolution granting authority for the use of certain balances of appropriations for the Light-House Establishment, to be available for certain named purposes;

S. 5656. An act for the enlargement and extension of the post-office building at Pawtucket, R. I.;

S. 5894. An act to provide for the completion of the enlargement of the Government building at Wichita, Kans., and for other purposes;

S. 5908. An act to amend an act authorizing the construction of a dam and bridge across the Missouri River in the State of Montana; and

S. 6028. An act to provide for safety of life on navigable waters during regattas or marine parades.

The message also announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. BAILEY and Mr. GALLINGER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the Executive Departments; for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department."

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct attention to the suggestions made in a very able and interesting address delivered by Mr. Meyer, Postmaster-General, at a banquet of the New England Postmasters' Association, Boston, Mass., October 12, 1907, a part of which I will read:

I want to draw to the attention of you gentlemen at this time certain features and inconsistencies in connection with the parcel-post service: In the first place, it does not seem to be understood by many of our people that we have a parcel post at present. The rate is 16 cents a pound, and the limit of weight 4 pounds. To illustrate the incongruities that exist: Any individual entering the post-office here in Boston or in any other city or town in the country, with two parcels, each weighing 4 pounds, can send one parcel to New York for 64 cents, while for the other parcel, which is addressed to some one in a foreign land and goes via New York, he will have to pay but 48 cents, for the reason that the rate to foreign countries is 12 cents a pound, while the rate to our own people is 16 cents a pound. * * * Therefore, I assume that our Representatives in Congress will realize that they can not afford to stand for a policy that compels our own people to pay 4 cents more on packages to people living in the United States (and even then permits them to send only 4 pounds) than on packages to people living in twenty-two foreign lands, for which they need pay only 12 cents a pound, and which may weigh up to 11 pounds. * * *

Two interests are opposing the extension of parcel post in this country—the express companies and the country retail merchants. The latter fear that the mail-order houses will derive a benefit to their own disadvantage. It is in connection with the country retail merchants that I desire to speak especially.

I propose to recommend the establishment of a parcel post on rural routes which will meet the objections of the small storekeepers and retailers. This will be a boon to our rural population and to the storekeeper, as the latter can receive his orders by mail or telephone and dispatch the desired merchandise by the rural carrier. The farmer will be saved from hitching up his horse and losing the time he needs for planting or harvesting his crops, and it will enable the storekeeper to increase his sales and meet the requirements of modern trade. If my recommendations are adopted, it will cost 12 cents a pound for the mail-order house to send parcels to the rural-delivery patron from any city post-office, while for delivery from the distributing office of the rural route, or if mailed by a patron of any rural route for delivery to a patron on the same route or at the distributing office of said route, the charge will be but 5 cents for the first pound and 2 cents for each additional pounds up to 11 pounds, or 25 cents for a package weighing 11 pounds.

This statement is indeed misleading: not that I charge the Postmaster-General with any intent to deceive or mislead, for I regard him as a gentleman of integrity, intelligence, ability, and actuated with the highest motives and with a determination to do justice to all, and I am not questioning his motives, but will endeavor to present the facts in the light that I see them. When we have all of the facts, I will venture to assume that Representatives in Congress will realize that they can afford to stand for a policy that compels people living in foreign lands to pay more than people living in our own country. The Postmaster-General's statement as to the sending of two pieces, each weighing 4 ounces, is correct in some cases, and the domestic rate in some cases is higher than the foreign; but in the majority of cases foreign rates are the highest. In his excellent address to enlighten members of the New England Postmasters' Association and the country, he might have gone further by saying: "To illustrate the incongruities that exist, any individual entering the post-office here in Boston, or in any other city or town in the country, with two parcels, each weighing 1 ounce, can send one parcel to New York for 1 cent, while for the other parcel, which is addressed to somebody in foreign lands via New York, he will have to pay 12 cents, for the reason that the rate to foreign countries is 12 cents per pound or fraction thereof, while the rate to our own people is only 1 cent per ounce. Therefore the rate on the parcel addressed to somebody in foreign lands is 12 times as great as is the rate on the parcel addressed to New York." And he might have referred to the report of the Second Assistant for the year ending June 30, 1907, pages 25 and 26:

THE UNIVERSAL POSTAL UNION.

No additional countries have entered the Universal Postal Union during the past year.

FOREIGN PARCEL POST.

During the year additional parcel-post conventions have been negotiated with Bermuda (effective January 31, 1907) and Ecuador (effective February 28, 1907). The convention with Bermuda admits "parcels" up to 11 pounds, without limit of value, at the rate of 12 cents a pound; while the convention with Ecuador admits parcels up to 11 pounds, but limits the value of any one parcel to $50 and fixes the postage rate at 20 cents a pound.

The conventions concluded during the preceding fiscal year went into operation upon the dates fixed therefor, viz, Sweden, February 1; Peru, September 1; Denmark, October 1, 1906, respectively.

The postage rates for "parcels" are 20 cents a pound or fraction of a pound for parcels which require the use of the expensive transit across the Isthmus of Panama and 12 cents a pound or fraction of a pound for parcels which do not use that expensive transit.

It should be noted that the rates quoted above are for a pound or fraction of a pound. So that as much postage must be paid on a parcel weighing only an ounce as on one weighing 16 ounces, and as much on a parcel weighing 17 ounces as on one weighing 32 ounces.

Or he might have said: "If the two parcels referred to, weighing 4 pounds each, or 64 ounces each, or 128 ounces for the two, had been divided into parcels of 1 ounce each, and one-half of them directed to parties in New York, the rate on the sixty-four parcels would have been 64 cents to New York, and the postage on the sixty-four parcels addressed to London would be $7.68." According to the Second Assistant's report, rates on parcels addressed to foreign countries are not uniform. The rate to Bermuda is 12 cents per pound, and the rate to Ecuador is 20 cents per pound. The rate to Sweden, Peru, and Denmark is 20 cents per pound or fraction of a pound for parcels which require the use of the expensive transit across the Isthmus of Panama, and 12 cents per pound or fraction of a pound for parcels which do not use that expensive transit. So we find that rates on parcels weighing 1 ounce addressed to Sweden, Peru, or Denmark which require the use of the expensive transit across the Isthmus of Panama is 20 cents, or twenty times as high as the rate on parcels weighing 1 ounce addressed to New York. Why this incongruity in rates? Rates on mail matter between the United States, Canada, Cuba, Mexico, and Panama are fixed by treaty with each country and with all other countries by conventions of the Universal Postal Union. The last convention was held at Rome, 1906, and took effect October 1, 1907. The acts of those conventions are binding on these countries, but have nothing to do with domestic rates, they being fixed by Congress and the Department. The conventions are simply agreements as to international mail matter. The rate on parcels post is fixed with each country, or in thirty-five parcels-post conventions. The rate is generally 12 cents per pound or fraction thereof, the pound being the unit of weight. The rate is 1 cent per ounce. The rate on 5 ounces to the Philippine Islands is 5 cents and to London 12 cents.

Another statement made by the Postmaster-General, page 8:

Two interests are opposing the extension of parcels post in this country—the express companies and the country retail merchants.

The first I deny. Speaking for myself, will say that I have never been approached, directly or indirectly, for or against parcels post or any other proposition by any agent for any express company. Furthermore, the express companies have nothing to fear from competition with the Government. The business of express companies is conducted by business men and along business lines and is subject to control by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The post-office business is conducted by Congress and the Department, and, like all other business transactions of this Government, it is the more expensive. Express companies carry parcels weighing 100 pounds from New York to Chicago, a distance of 1,000 miles, for $3, and if the rates charged by the express companies are too high, it is then up to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix a reasonable rate, as the law provides. The Government pays the railroad company an average of about 4.6 cents per pound, or $4.60 per hundred, for actual mail matter carried for an average haul of three or four hundred miles, ranging from 1 pound to carload lots, and sometimes trainload lots; and the average cost of handling all mail matter is about 17 cents per pound. The express rate on a pair of shoes from Boston to my home town, Northwood, Iowa, is from 23 to 27 cents per pair.

The postal rate on a pair of shoes weighing 2½ pounds would be 40 cents, exclusive of the weight of the box. It is therefore evident that the express companies have nothing to fear, and there is no reason why they should oppose it; but there is one powerful interest in favor of parcels post, and that is the railroad companies, as their profits for carrying an increased mail would be much larger than for carrying express, as the Government pays a much higher rate to the railroads than do the express companies, and it would mean millions of dollars to them. The Postmaster-General further states that he proposes to recommend the establishment of parcels post on rural routes, etc. I suggest that in his anxiety to help our rural population, to save the farmer from hitching up his horse and losing the time he needs for planting and harvesting his crops, and to enable the storekeepers to increase their sales and meet the requirements of modern trade, he can best accomplish that by reducing the cost of carrying the parcels rather than to increase the cost, as he proposes to do. Under the present law those people are well cared for. The carriers may carry merchandise for hire on request of patrons residing on their respective routes whenever the same shall not interfere with the proper discharge of their official duties, and under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe. My understanding is that the regulations of the Department restrict the carrier to carrying unmailable matter only. As you will see, the privilege of carrying parcels is left to the discretion of the Postmaster-General. If he will remove these restrictions, or if Congress will provide that all parcels shall be carried by the rural carrier for hire, and, if necessary, fix a maximum rate, the service can be had at a much lower rate than the one proposed, and these people can be just as well accommodated. This privilege was granted carriers at first, and until Congress and the Postmaster-General placed restrictions on the carriers, which was done with a view of insuring the people living in the rural districts a better service. It goes without saying that a carrier carrying a light load can and will give better and more prompt service than one carrying a heavy load. If additional packages are to be carried the carriers' compensation should be increased. Under such an arrangement the carrier would get the fee, and would therefore have no claim on the Government. But if the parcels are to be carried, and the fee paid the Government, the carrier will have a just claim for an increase of salary and of course would demand it, and in justice to him his salary would have to be increased. In my opinion the increase of salary would largely exceed the increase in receipts. If the Postmaster-General does not care to assume the responsibility of impairing the service by extending it through the removal of these restrictions, Congress can do it, if in its judgment it is deemed advisable. But the contention is that this arrangement will not reduce the deficit. Why should the farmer and country storekeeper make up a deficit not caused by him, but which is due to other causes, such as the carrying of certain mail matter at a loss, especially second-class matter, the franking privilege, and the exorbitant rates paid railroad companies.

I take it that the recent order as to second-class matter will cut down the deficit, if not entirely wipe it out. As to the franking privileges, if the documents sent out and the dissemination of this knowledge is not worth the deficit, why not discontinue it? Another way to reduce the deficit is by reducing the pay to the railroad companies. Congress and the Department reduced their pay some $9,000,000 last year; and notwithstanding the fact that Congress last year also increased the pay of clerks and carriers some $12,000,000, the deficit in the Post-Office Department has been decreased from $10,516,996 in 1906 to $6,350,237 in 1907. So, if the receipts increase as they have in the past, evidently there will be no deficit next year; but I do not believe that that will be necessary in order to wipe out the deficit. I read from a report from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads submits the following report in explanation of the bill recommending appropriations for the postal service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909:

The Post-Office Department in its estimates to Congress, as appears from pages 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, and 380 of the Book of Estimates, recommends for the postal service a total of $230,441,016.

The total amount carried by the bill, as now recommended, is $220,765,392, being $9,675,624 less than the original estimates of the Department.

The amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1908 was $212,091,193. The amount now recommended for the fiscal year 1909 exceeds the amount appropriated for the fiscal year 1908 by $8,674,199, an increase of 4.09 per cent.

The appropriation for the fiscal year 1908 was 10.65 per cent increase over the appropriation for 1907 (this increased per cent was largely occasioned by the increase in salaries of postal employees) and 11.66 per cent increase over the expenditures for 1907, which expenditures were $189,935,242.

The receipts for the postal service for the fiscal year 1907 were $183,585,005, which was 9.3 per cent increase over the receipts for the fiscal year 1906, which receipts were $167,932,783.

While the expenditures for the fiscal year 1906, amounting to $178,449,799, exceeded the receipts for that year by $10,516,996, still the receipts for the fiscal year 1907, amounting to $183,585,005, really exceeded the expenditures for the preceding fiscal year of 1906 $5,135,206.

The expenditures for the fiscal year 1907 amounted to $189,935,242, or $6,350,237 in excess of the receipts.

The average appropriation for eleven years shows an increase of 7.15 per cent, the receipts for the same period increased an average of 7.6 per cent, while the expenditures show an average increase of 6.83 per cent.

The reductions made by the committee in the last session in railway mail pay and railway postal car pay have shown good results, the saving in railway mail pay reaching almost $2,000,000, or 3.63 per cent; in the car pay a saving of nearly $1,000,000, or 9.65 per cent; by the withdrawal of supplies from the mails a saving of $800,000, or 1.77 per cent, has been effected.

But if a deficit is anticipated, I believe that a further reduction of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 can be made without working a hardship to the railroads.

Now, a word as to the franking privilege. There seems to be much misunderstanding about it. Some seem to look upon the distribution of public documents and seeds as a Congressional graft; that it is in the interest of Members of Congress and Senators, and not for the diffusion of knowledge. As everybody knows, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and documents are printed, and every Department is required to make reports. We spend millions of dollars every year for scientific and practical research work; in gathering statistics and information of every kind, and reports are made as to the results of these investigations. Take, for instance, the Agriculture Department, with its corps of scientists, the ablest and most industrious in the world, pursuing their duties with fidelity and enthusiasm along their respective lines. What would all of this amount to if not published and given to the public, so that the people may know, have the benefit of the discoveries, the valuable work in general, and how the public moneys are appropriated and expended? If the documents are worth printing, they are certainly worth the price of distribution. How are they distributed? At present they are apportioned among Members and Senators. The practice may be wrong, but it is believed that Members and Senators are in a better position to place these documents where they ought to be placed than are the Departments. Lists are secured, furnished by reliable people in various parts of the districts, and care is exercised in sending such documents as is believed will prove of interest to the parties to receive them. Yearbooks are generally sent to the farmers, education reports to libraries and those especially interested in educational work, and so on. If the seeds and documents are to be sent out, some provision must be made for transporting them. I take it that it is not intended that Members and Senators should pay the postage; if they did, it would greatly exceed their salaries; if not franked, postage would have to be provided, and the cost to the Government would be exactly the same, if sent through the mail.

The policy of Congress has been to disseminate knowledge not only by the distribution of public documents, but by encouraging worthy and legitimate publications—the weekly, the semiweekly, the dailies, and other periodicals. It has given newspapers and magazines a rate of postage not with a view of making money out of transporting the periodicals, but for the diffusion of knowledge and happiness and to promote education, and in so doing it has had the welfare of our people at heart. Its object has been toward enlightenment and a march onward and upward. Are we now to take a backward step? If so, advance the rate on second-class mail matter and deprive the legitimate and worthy publishers of this low rate and discontinue the distribution of public documents. If this is done you will undoubtedly reduce the deficit. But can we afford to do it?

So much for parcels post, or this entering wedge to parcels post, and government ownership. I will dismiss the subject by saying that foreign rates on parcels post are fixed by parcels-post conventions, or rather by treaties. It is a reciprocal arrangement between two countries. I have shown that in a large majority of cases the rates on parcels sent through the mail to foreign countries are much higher than domestic rates, but if the foreign rates are too low—if too liberal concessions have been made—it is for the Executive or the Post-Office Department to correct the error, and not for Congress. I do not believe it just or feasible to adopt a plan that will compel the country storekeeper and farmer to make up a deficit which is not their fault, but which is due to other causes, but I do believe that the results desired by the Postmaster-General—that is, to extend the service—can be better accomplished by removing the restrictions on the carriers.

Now, a word as to the postal savings banks proposition. I read from Mr. Meyer's speech:

Another matter of great public interest which I shall recommend for the consideration of Congress is the postal savings banks system. * * * Our object is to bring hidden money to light—to instill life into it, and to lead it again into the channels of trade for the mutual benefit of labor and capital, and thus add to the prosperity throughout the land. * * *

It is proposed to bring this money into circulation by asking authority from Congress to place the deposits in the national banks of the country, not in a few financial centers, but in the banks of the district where the money has been deposited. I have been assured by prominent presidents of national banks that the Post-Office Department may count on receiving for such money turned over to them a rate of interest varying from 2 to 3 per cent. The Department would guarantee the depositor 2 per cent, or 1 per cent semiannually. Thus evidence is given to the savings banks that we are not in competition with them and that our business would in nowise affect their deposits, their rates being usually from 3 to 4 per cent. The amount of money in the United States is estimated to be $3,123,056,673, of which $1,010,700,000 is in the banks and $333,855,053 in the Treasury; the balance, $1,778,501,620, being in the hands of individuals and other sources. This last amount seems large at first glance, but when we think of the wages that people are earning to-day, and that if each person in the country had in his possession $10 in cash, $800,000,000 would be accounted for, or about half the amount.

Postal savings bank system, the Government guaranteeing bank deposits, and the parcels post are of course all steps in the direction of Government ownership and socialism, but I will not undertake to discuss Government ownership at this time, although that is a question that will have to be met sooner or later. Bryan and Hearst have declared in favor of it. Hearst will be the candidate of his party for President. Bryan will be the nominee of the Democratic party, and that means that the Democratic party will have to swallow not only Bryan, 16 to 1, but Government ownership, not on the installment plan, but in total. In view of our experience with Government ownership I am free to say that I am somewhat skeptical of the proposition. I have already referred to the cost of carrying on the post-office business. It is generally believed that that business could be carried on more efficiently and cheaply by an individual than by the Government. Besides, we have the Government Printing Office. Notwithstanding the fact that we have the largest and best mechanically equipped printing office in the world, with millions of dollars invested, the Government printing costs, in many cases, twice as much as under a contract system. I read from a newspaper clipping giving extracts from Havenner's report, an expert appointed by the President to investigate:

PRINTING COST HIGHER—GOVERNMENT OFFICE EXPENSE 2 TO 117 PER CENT MORE—REPORT MADE TO PRESIDENT—MR. HAVENNER DECLARES COST OF COMPOSITION HAS INCREASED NEARLY 40 PER CENT—INCREASE IN PRICE ADMITTED BY PUBLIC PRINTER, WHO SAYS REAL PRICES WERE NOT BEFORE KNOWN.

FROM THE REPORT.

"It is my opinion that the cost of printing has increased both apparently and actually within the past few months, without a corresponding increase in the quality of the product."

In exhibits submitted, the Department of State shows that the Government Printing Office charged $4.10 per thousand for embossing paper that had in other cases been bought by the Government under contract for $2 per thousand.

The Department of the Interior submits a table showing that there has been an increase of 51 per cent in the cost of printing specifications of patents in the first six months of this year, while there is an increase of only 15 per cent in the number of patents issued for the same period.

"An investigation could best be pursued by a committee composed of practical printers, who would also be conversant with the theoretical end of the business and familiar with the conditions under which Government printing is done."

That the cost of printing at the Government Printing Office for the various Executive Departments of the Government has increased during the administration of Charles A. Stillings, the present Public Printer, is shown in the report made to President Roosevelt by George C. Havenner, chief of the division of printing in the Department of Commerce and Labor.

The increased cost varies from 2 per cent to 117 per cent on various classes of matter, and the increases apply to every Department of the Government.

MR. HAVENNER AN EXPERT.

Mr. Havenner, who is an expert in the work of estimating the cost of printing, was directed by the President to make a careful examination into the cost of all classes of printing done for the Executive Departments, with a view of ascertaining the present cost as compared with the cost of the same classes of work heretofore. Mr. Havenner's investigation showed that the cost of composition, for instance, had increased nearly 40 per cent, notwithstanding that the best modern facilities are employed in the Government Printing Office. The cost of nearly every other line of work incident to the production of printed documents showed a like increase, and in some instances a very much greater increase.

In summarizing the results of this inquiry, Mr. Havenner says:

NO INCREASE IN QUALITY.

"It is my opinion that the cost of printing has increased both apparently and actually within the past few months without a corresponding increase in the quality of the product, notwithstanding that the tendency, owing to the increased use and efficiency of typesetting and other machinery, should be to decrease."

This is a fair sample of what we may expect with Government ownership. "Government Printing Office charging $4.10 per thousand for embossing paper that has in other cases been bought by the Government under contract for $2 per thousand." Think of it! This and other experiences ought to satisfy every enthusiast, but, as before stated, I do not care to discuss Government ownership at this time, but will briefly discuss this postal savings-banks proposition. The suggestion is that the Government is to accept deposits and guarantee the depositor 2 per cent, or 1 per cent, semiannually, and the money thus deposited shall be turned over to national banks in the same district at a rate varying from 2 to 3 per cent; and that as banks now pay from 3 to 4 per cent on deposit, it is safe to count on the banks accepting deposits on these terms. Of course banks would rather accept money on deposit and pay only 2 or 3 per cent than to pay 3 or 4 per cent, but where does the depositor come in? Where is the advantage to him, except that a safe place to deposit his money at a much lower rate of interest is provided for where safe banks can not be found? But how about the Government? It is to deposit the money in the very banks not considered safe by the depositors.

Is the Government in a better position to know the solvency of the bank than the depositor? As a general thing the Government knows less about the standing of a bank and banker than does the depositors. All the Government knows about it is the report made by the examiner. This report is published, and the depositor has the same information that the Government has, and besides he knows something about the character, integrity, and standing of the banker, also his financial standing outside of the bank and his capacity for meeting assessments if the bank should fail, which the Government knows nothing about. But some say let the Government deposit the money in banks in other districts. If so, where would the money go? Where are the Government funds generally deposited to-day? In Wall street and in the larger cities. Gentlemen, we have too much money deposited in Wall street now, and with our recent experience with Wall street the less money deposited there by the Government the better. Let the wild-cat Wall street speculator take care of himself without this Government coming to his support.

If postal savings banks are established, and the Government has any money to offer for deposit, of course the banks would rather pay 2 or 3 per cent for deposits than to purchase Government bonds for deposit as security for Government deposits, as is now required, as it would be more profitable to them, especially in localities where the rate of interest is high.

Take, for instance, where the interest rate is 10 per cent; if a bank has $105,000 available for loaning or investment and accepts a deposit of $100,000 under the present regulations the bank must purchase $100,000 of United States bonds. It has to pay a premium on an average of about 5 per cent. It first invests its $105,000 in United States bonds; it deposits these bonds with the Government and receives $100,000. Under the law it is permitted to loan $85,000 of this amount, and $15,000 must be held in reserve, but banks do not and can not loan up to the limit at all times, and the average reserve held is, say, 25 per cent. It can then only loan about $75,000. The interest on the $75,000 at 10 per cent would be $7,500. It gets 2 per cent on the United States bonds, or $2,000. Add the $2,000 to the $7,500 and it has $9,500 interest, while if it had loaned the $105,000, which was invested in the United States bonds at 10 per cent, it would have had in interest $10,500, a loss then of $1,000, besides the depreciation of the $5,000 invested in premiums on said bonds, which, of course, decrease in value as the time of maturity approaches. It, of course, gets some interest on the amount of the reserve deposited with its reserve agency, but it must also take the risk of fire and burglary or pay insurance on the amount held in the vault.

On the other hand, if a bank accepts $100,000 deposits from the Government and pays 3 per cent, against which no purchase and deposit of United States bonds is required, it can loan not only the $75,000 of this $100,000 deposited but it also has the $105,000 to loan, or a total of $180,000. The interest on $180,000 at 10 per cent would be $18,000. Deduct interest of 3 per cent paid on the $100,000 deposit, or $3,000, and it has left $15,000.

Therefore the net profit on the $105,000 and the $100,000 deposited by the Government under the present regulations which require a deposit of bonds, is $9,500; while under the proposed regulations if the bank pays 3 per cent on the $100,000 deposited by the Government, but is required to furnish no bond, the net profit on the $105,000 and the $100,000 is $15,000, or $5,500 more than under the present regulations, besides there are no bonds or premiums to depreciate.

Again, under the proposed plan, omitting the $105,000, a bank accepting $100,000 deposit and loaning $75,000 thereof at 10 per cent would receive $7,500 interest. Deducting the $3,000 interest it would be required to pay the Government, it would make a net profit of 4½ per cent, or $4,500, on the Government deposit. If the interest is low, say 6 per cent, of course the difference and profits would be less. For instance, on the first proposition, the interest on the $75,000 would be $4,500 and the interest on the United States bonds would be $2,000, or a total of $6,500; the interest on the $105,000, at 6 per cent, would be only $6,300, leaving a profit to the bank of $200 in place of a loss of $1,000 where the interest is 10 per cent. As to the second proposition, figuring interest on $180,000 at 6 per cent, the bank would get $10,800 interest. Deducting the 3 per cent interest paid the Government on the $100,000, or $3,000, it would leave $7,800, while the interest on $105,000 loaned at 6 per cent would be $6,300, leaving a profit of only $1,500. The bank would make $200 on the first proposition and $1,500 on the second. Omitting the $105,000, a bank accepting $100,000 deposit and loaning $75,000 thereof at 6 per cent would receive $4,500 interest. Deducting the $3,000 interest paid the Government, it would have a net profit of 1½ per cent, or $1,500, on the Government deposit. The bond-secured currency was devised for the purpose of selling bonds to carry on the war, and the bond-secured deposits to enable the Government to refund its bonds and to borrow money at a low rate of interest. By creating this demand for bonds, 2 per cent bonds are selling at a premium, which means a saving to the Government of at least 1 per cent, or $8,000,000, annually, in interest on its $800,000,000 interest-bearing debt. If a change in this regulation is to be made, and the money is to be deposited in banks, and no deposit of bonds as security for deposits is required, but interest is to be paid by the bank, what will be the result? If the Government keeps on deposit with banks on an average $200,000,000, and receives 3 per cent on said deposits, it will get $6,000,000 interest annually. If it has to pay 1 per cent, or $8,000,000 annually extra interest on its interest-bearing debt, the increase in the rate of interest will exceed the interest received on deposits by $2,000,000.

Viewing it from the standpoint of a banker, I take it that this would be very agreeable to banks and bankers, but why limit the deposits to national banks? Are not other banks entitled to as much consideration as national banks? Why class legislation? Why divert the deposits from one bank to another, or from one locality to another? If arrangement could be made for an equitable distribution of these deposits, and give to each community the use and benefit of money belonging to that community, and if the Government can be protected against loss, and if the depositor can be furnished a safe place to deposit his money, then I can see no objection to the legislation, and I know of no objection to it, and I believe the suggestion would meet with almost universal approval—certainly by bankers and people living in rural districts, were it not for this Government ownership feature of it and the fact that the Government generally makes a failure of all business undertakings, due to the red-tape, bunglesome, and unbusinesslike ways of transacting business, founded on political and not business methods.

And in making this statement I want to make myself clear. That is, in no way do I want to be understood as critising or reflecting on any Department, or anybody in any way connected therewith, or employed therein. We have in our Departments some of the most excellent people, men and women of integrity, industry, intelligence, and ability. I yield to nobody in admiration and appreciation of our conscientious, patriotic, and worthy President; but the Departments are not altogether responsible, as the business affairs of this Government come under two branches—the legislative and executive; and its success depends not only on the just and wise administration of laws, but upon the enactment of such laws as well.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] make the point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state what his point of order is?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will be courteous enough to the Chair to await the invitation of the Chair.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will be courteous enough to the people of the United States, whom he thinks do not want this convenience.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] to state his point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; we want to know what it is now.

Mr. OVERSTREET. We are now proceeding in order. That was the desire which I had. Mr. Chairman, this provision which is now under consideration is for pay of rural carriers under a permanent statute passed some time ago—I have forgotten the date.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair merely desires the gentleman to state what the point of order is.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That it is contrary to existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 27 by adding, at the end of line 14, the following: "Provided further, That service by carrier on rural delivery routes shall not be suspended on legal holidays."

Mr. SMALL. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, it is subject to a point of order, as will be disclosed by what I shall say. At present carriers on rural routes observe as holidays New Year's Day, Washington's Birthday, Decoration Day, Independence Day, Labor Day, Thanksgiving Day, and such other days as are designated as holidays by proclamation or by the statutes of the several States. That is an unfair condition for the rural service of the country, and it exists only by regulation of the Postmaster-General or by special orders made from time to time in advance of these holidays. There is no similar instance under the Post-Office Department where such an inconvenience is worked as is worked on the rural routes. I have an instance in my mind of an every-other-day rural route, where the service was on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, and a holiday coming on Saturday, and therefore the patrons on that route had no service from Thursday until the following Tuesday. I say no such inconvenience is worked to the patrons of the Department in any other section, and it is an unfair discrimination against the good people who live on the farms. Take the cities, if you please, and they have on holidays at least one collection and one delivery—that is, where they have city carriers—and where they do not have city deliveries the post-offices are kept open a sufficient length of time for patrons to receive and deposit their mail, and the mails are received and dispatched as on ordinary days.

On all the railroads, steamboats, and on star routes throughout the country the mails are carried on holidays. The railway postal clerks are required to work on holidays; and it is unfair to those who live in the rural sections, and to whom the blessing of rural service has been brought, that they should be subjected to this inconvenience. Now, some may think that consideration of the rural carriers would justify them in voting against this amendment. No one feels a greater interest in the rural carriers than I. I have urged and voted for every increase in their salary. I voted to give them fifteen days' vacation with pay. I will continue to urge favorable legislation; but I will say that where there is one rural carrier there is an average of 75 to 200 patrons who are inconvenienced, and the interests of the many should be considered as superior to that of the few. The rural service was established for the benefit of all the people, and those who live on the farms are as much entitled to receive their mail as those who live in the city.

In addition to that, on all these routes there is one substitute, and that substitute may carry the mail upon this particular day, so that the regular carrier may observe the holiday. It is not that I and other Members may not feel an interest in the carriers; it is simply that I feel a greater interest in the hundreds of thousands of patrons upon these rural routes. Under a law which we passed last session, or two or three sessions ago, these rural carriers have fifteen days' annual leave with pay. I favored this and also the increase in salary, and will vote to further increase their pay; but I do say that upon these thousands of rural routes, with these hundreds of thousands of patrons upon these routes, they should receive their mail on every week day, regardless of whether it be a holiday or not.

Now, as to the point of order that has been reserved, and will probably be made, I wish to say that this is a regulation made by the Postmaster-General. It is made under no express or general authority of law; and I challenge anyone, the chairman of the committee, if he shall make the point of order, or anyone else, to point out any authority whereby the Postmaster-General is authorized to suspend service on these rural routes or elsewhere; and it is, besides, perfectly germane to the paragraph which we are considering. So that if these regulations were made without authority of law, express or general, and if it is merely the action of the Postmaster-General, then it is not in violation of the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I insist upon the point of order.

Mr. SMALL. I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from North Carolina briefly on the point of order.

Mr. SMALL. I say, Mr. Chairman, that there is no authority of law for suspending this service on rural routes; that it exists by regulation, and in support of that proposition I have a letter from the Postmaster-General stating in express terms that it is not by statute, but by regulation of the Department. The only authority of law by which the Postmaster-General might make regulations is contained in Revised Statutes 396.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from North Carolina if there is any law requiring the Postmaster-General to do that which is required in his amendment?

Mr. SMALL. In my opinion, there is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear any further on the point of order. In view of the fact that this amendment makes law, there being none in existence, it is legislation on an appropriation bill and therefore in violation of the rule.

Mr. SMALL. The Chairman will pardon me a moment. In answer to that suggestion I desire to say it does not make law. It is simply an enforcement of existing law, which requires the mail on rural routes, whether it be a daily service or whether it be an every-other-day service, be carried at regular intervals. Therefore this amendment is only an enforcement of existing law, and can not change existing law. It is not new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in the nature of a limitation upon the appropriation. It appears on its face to be a new provision of law, and therefore in violation of the rule against legislation upon general appropriation bills. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to come in at the same place.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That carriers on rural routes more than 24 miles in length shall receive for each mile in excess of 24 $30 per annum in addition to the maximum pay now authorized by law.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order against the amendment, that it is contrary to existing law.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Will you reserve it for a minute?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. All I have to say is this: This is service on the mileage basis, the Department having fixed 24 miles as a standard. If a carrier travels less than 24 miles, then there is deducted from his maximum pay of $900 so much per mile. There are cases where, on account of rivers, roads, and local conditions, the carriers are obliged to make a circuit of 27, 28, or 30 miles in order to get back to the distributing office. All I ask is that those people who are traveling 27, 28, or 30 miles shall receive reasonable compensation for this extra work. That is all I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, as the amendment clearly authorizes something not now authorized by existing law.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the same place.

The Clerk read as follows.

That rural carriers shall not be required to carry mail on the 25th day of December.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I make the point of order on that that it is subject to the same objection as the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend on page 27 by inserting, after line 14, the words "Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used to pay for carrying in the mails any malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors, or intoxicating liquors of any kind, or any cocaine or derivatives thereof."

Mr. OVERSTREET. Is this the same as the other amendment, which applied to transportation over railroad routes?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I thought possibly the gentleman would let the matter alone so far as the farmer was concerned, and would permit liquor to be carried on rural routes for the benefit of the farmer.

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir; I do not want it carried at all.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to the amendment. I move to amend by striking out the last six words of the amendment—that is, the part referring to the carrying of cocaine on rural routes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "or any cocaine or derivatives thereof."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman, who is a practicing physician, will give us some reason for that.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. My reason for offering this amendment is that all over this country of ours where the mail is carried by rural delivery there are a great many country physicians who are living in the little villages away from the railroads and where there are no drug stores, and they are only accessible to their towns through these rural routes. A physician practicing in such a locality is now enabled to telephone to his druggist in the city in the morning and have a quantity of cocaine delivered to him when the mail carrier comes out during the forenoon. This is an important thing, as I can testify, having practiced medicine for a few years. Cocaine is an important medicinal agent as a local anæsthetic in the practice of medicine, and to be deprived of the privilege of securing it when he needs it is a hardship upon the country doctor.

Then there is a further reason why this amendment should be voted down, in so far as rural routes are concerned, where it was not in the other places in this bill. The great difficulty that comes from the use of cocaine and the great abuse that comes from it is almost entirely confined to the city, and does not exist in the country. There is practically none of it in the rural districts anywhere in this country to-day. So that the voting down of this part of the amendment would, I think, be of benefit to humanity and to physicians practicing in the country. For these reasons I hope my amendment will prevail.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the other day when I offered the amendment in reference to cocaine I stated, after a conversation with my distinguished colleague from Illinois in reference to the matter, that I was quite satisfied the amendment as offered would not go into the law. While it was an item in the bill which left the House, it would not be in the law in that shape. I introduced in the House to-day a bill on the subject of the transportation of cocaine, at the request of parties who are giving considerable attention to it, the retail druggists. I take it that when this bill becomes a law if anything in reference to cocaine is in the bill (and possibly also the same might apply as to intoxicating liquors, although I express no opinion about that), it ought to make an exception in favor of licensed physicians, dentists, retail druggists, and probably the shipping from one manufacturer or wholesale druggist to another; and the provision ought to be a positive inhibition on the transportation of this article and similar articles by mail, with a penalty clause attached. It is perfectly evident that the Post-Office Department itself will not be able to tell whether the package contains cocaine unless it be marked "cocaine." I think the only effect of putting the provision in the bill is to indicate the attitude of the House that there ought to be, in a proper way, legislation upon this subject along proper lines, and whether this amendment now offered by the gentleman prevails or not—and I trust it will not—I hope that he will not insist upon it, so that the matter can be perfected and be in one place in the law, instead of in four or five different places.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman says that there should be some amendment by which the prohibition should be so limited that in case of drugs furnished to dentists and doctors they should be transported. How is it possible for the Post-Office Department to ascertain the source from which its mail packages come?

Mr. MANN. That is exactly what I said before the gentleman asked the question—that I did not think the provision in the bill, the way it is in, if it became a law, would practically amount to a great deal.

Mr. PERKINS. Then why should we put it in?

Mr. MANN. It will amount to a great deal if it remains in the bill as passing the House, because, if it becomes a law, it will contain an inhibition upon the subject of transporting these articles by mail with a penalty to enforce it, except to licensed physicians and people of that class who ought to be supplied. You could put a thousand provisions in here that no part of the money can be used for the purpose of transporting cocaine by mail, but, if there is no penalty in it, it amounts to nothing. It is only a direction to the Post-Office Department, which has no means of ascertaining whether cocaine is transported or whether intoxicating liquor is transported. It puts the provision into the bill as it passes the House in such a way that the committee in charge must either recede or strike out the provision as we put it in and put it in proper shape. I hope the gentleman will let this go with the rest, because the result will be satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment, because it is not far-reaching enough. If we take it upon ourselves to say what shall be kept from the people, let us go a little further and keep patent medicines containing alcohol away from them. If I take a small glass of beer I do not get as much alcohol into me as I do when I take a teaspoonful of Peruna. [Laughter.]

Let me show you the amount of alcohol in these medicines taken from a letter that I received from the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture.

Here is Peruna, which contains 18 per cent of alcohol; Warner's Safe Cure, 15.12 per cent alcohol; Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, 39 per cent alcohol. There is something good for you people to use who oppose the drinking of alcohol in its original state. [Laughter.] Wine of Cardui contains 20 per cent alcohol. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound contains 18 per cent alcohol.

Now, while I am on the floor I wish to refer to the remarks made by my dear friend from Tennessee yesterday. He alluded to that beautiful part of the Lord's prayer, "Do not lead us into temptation." Now, if my friend's ideas are carried out that part of the Lord's prayer may well be stricken out, because there will be nothing left with which to tempt people.

I fully agree with my friend from Tennessee that we ought to try to make people temperate. We only disagree as to the method.

I want to build up people strong in character, able to resist temptation. He wants to build up a nation of weaklings and sissies, from whom we must keep everything that is not good for them or that might be harmful to them. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph and amendment thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will ask the gentleman from North Carolina if his amendment is to this paragraph?

Mr. SMALL. It is to the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. This is an amendment to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] now offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding thereto:
"Providing the same may be carried when it is to be used for medicinal purposes, and upon the prescription of a physician."

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, has debate closed?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the postal service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons permanently incapacitated for performing such service. The establishment of a civil-pension roll or an honorable-service roll, or the exemption of any of the officers, clerks, and persons in the postal service from the existing laws respecting employment in such service is hereby prohibited.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order. Is that a provision of the existing statute?

Mr. TAWNEY. The current appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is the same as has been carried in several appropriation laws for postal service. There is no change of language in that paragraph.

Mr. MANN. That has been construed, then. There is carried in one provision of the bill something for taking care of people who are incapacitated.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Not permanently.

Mr. MANN. Then you provide in another place they shall not be taken care of. That has received a construction, I take it, and that this provision does not conflict with the other provision.

Mr. OVERSTREET. To which provision does the gentleman refer?

Mr. MANN. You take care of the railway mail clerks who are incapacitated?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then you say here that the appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the postal service shall not be available for the compensation of any persons permanently incapacitated for performing such service. That is apparently in direct conflict with the theory of the other provision.

Mr. OVERSTREET. This refers to the permanent incapacity of the clerk, while the provision in the Railway Mail Service carries the salary of the clerk for one year, and in case of death pays his widow or heirs $1,000.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a railway mail clerk becomes permanently incapacitated?

Mr. OVERSTREET. He gets his salary for one year, and then he goes out of the service.

Mr. MANN. And this says that no portion of the money herein appropriated shall be used for the compensation of a person permanently incapacitated.

Mr. OVERSTREET. The construction is that it has never been decided that the clerk is permanently incapacitated until after the expiration of a year.

Mr. MANN. It has received that construction?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I do not say it has received it specifically, but that is my interpretation of it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will forgive me for calling attention to it, but our Committee on Reform in the Civil Service is listening now to many reasons why a civil-pension list should be established, and it had appeared to me that the arguments made before that committee were receiving great weight with most of the members of the committee. Of course it is not called a civil-pension list; it is called a retirement fund at the expense of the employees.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is what it is.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter the Postmaster-General shall each year prepare and submit in his annual report to Congress estimates of the revenue and expenditures in the postal service for the fiscal year current, and also for the fiscal year next ensuing at the time said report is submitted, together with a statement of the receipts and expenditures for the preceding completed fiscal year.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This is one of the concluding paragraphs of the post-office appropriation bill, which carries two hundred and twenty millions of dollars. Not since I have served in Congress have I seen a like bill go through the Committee of the Whole with like facility. No one has been denied the right to debate, no amendment has been shut off; but this bill, with the exception of a few minor paragraphs, goes through in its entirety. It will go from this committee to the House, and will go through the House probably without any contest at all. And after this bill leaves this committee it will be found that there will not exist the necessity of asking the help of the plenary power of the Committee on Rules; it will not be necessary to have a drastic special provision put upon it to force it through on special order without amendment or debate. And why? Because it was properly prepared as an appropriation bill—not carrying a great mass of new legislation subject to the point of order, new legislation that obscures and confuses the minds of Members as to values and purposes in the real appropriations.

It was prepared as an appropriation bill should be prepared. It came to this committee; it has gone through the committee with facility, with every Member who has watched its progress understanding it; and I think its history and even course here ought to demonstrate to every committee on appropriations of the House of Representatives the proper way in which to prepare a bill, and to change the custom in this House as regards appropriation bills so that the practice in the future would be that every piece of new legislation of great moment should come into this House and into this Committee of the Whole separately and on its own merits, and be considered here without confusing and without obscuring regular appropriations. I want to congratulate the men who are on the committee with me. I do not agree with them all the time. I do not always follow the chairman of the committee or the committee, but I do know how diligent, industrious, and hard working the chairman of this committee is and how hard worked that committee is, as hard worked a body of men as I have ever seen in or out of a legislature. I congratulate them on the near perfection of this bill, on its approval by this committee, its coming approval by the House, and I commend the course that has been taken here in the last three days to every chairman of every other appropriation committee of the House of Representatives. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter for the purpose of facilitating the handling of mail on United States naval vessels, competent enlisted men may, upon request of the Secretary of the Navy, be designated by the Post-Office Department as "Navy mail clerks" and "assistant Navy mail clerks," and authorized to receive and open all pouches and sacks of mail addressed to the vessels, to make proper delivery of such mail, to receive matter for transmission in the mails, and to receipt for registered matter (keeping an accurate record thereof), to keep and have for sale an adequate supply of postage stamps, and to make up and dispatch mails in accordance with instructions.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. On that section and the two following sections, being kindred sections, I make the point of order.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee if the ground of his point of order is that this is new legislation?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, the remainder of the bill, with the exception of the last paragraph, is new legislation; but I think upon explanation the committee will appreciate that it is wise legislation, and I believe the gentleman from Tennessee will not then insist upon his point of order. There is no appropriation carried; no expense incurred. It undertakes to authorize, however, the proper officers of our war vessels——

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield to a question? Will there not be expense incurred, but to be paid by the Navy Department instead of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. OVERSTREET. If the gentlemen will permit me to explain, I think I can make the matter clear.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to a question? I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee whether he had advised the gentleman from Kansas that these paragraphs in the bill were late items of legislation?

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman, if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] will permit me, they are new legislation, and so far as I know they are meritorious legislation, but the purposes would be served a great deal better if they were brought in separately.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to explain this paragraph, I would be glad to do so. There is now no provision at all for facilitating either the collection or distribution of mail addressed to the sailors and officers upon our war vessels. Registered mail and special delivery mail are often misplaced, and sometimes entirely lost, because of the lack of some system under which the sailors, officers, and other men upon these vessels may receive the mail. Many of these war vessels have many hundreds of men. These vessels touch only at a few ports. Mail addressed to the men must take its risk of reaching the vessels. Many times it is unknown where the vessels will put in, and the parties addressing the letters to the men and sailors and officers of the Navy are not advised as to how to get their mail to those men.

Now, these several provisions, the three or four paragraphs, merely install a system whereby a proper officer in command of the war vessel may delegate some man or men whose duty it will be to take charge of the mail, deliver it at the post for distribution to the points addressed, and to collect the mail addressed to the men on the vessels and see that it is delivered to them individually, and to receipt for registered mail and special-delivery matter. Provision is made under which these men must give bonds and be compelled to follow the rules and regulations of the postal service. It is recommended, indeed it is prepared, by the Navy Department, and sent through proper official channels to the Postmaster-General, and by the Postmaster-General transmitted to the committee with a recommendation for its passage. The expense, if any, answering my friend from New York [Mr. PERKINS], would be to the Navy Department in the event it should be found necessary to pay anything extra beyond what the men themselves would receive. I fancy, however, that it would only result in the men being detailed for this character of work for certain periods of time, and relieved from other duty, and not entail any additional expense.

Does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes; I yield the floor.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the provision in this bill for post-offices in the Navy is a rather crude and incomplete affair. It seems to me if that service is needed it would be better for us to pass a separate act, following out the rules of the House by not having any new legislation on appropriation bills in the way of amendment or otherwise. My friend from Indiana for two or three days has prevented this House from having new legislation on this bill, and it has not been more than half an hour since he prevented me from securing a vote on an amendment that affects the rights and interests of twenty-five or thirty millions of people in the United States living in the country. I suggest to him that if he wants new legislation on an appropriation bill in violation of the rules of the House, there ought to be some reciprocity in his movement.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly; for a question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Does the gentleman regard it as fair and proper reciprocity to compare legislation which contains a provision for the distribution of mail to the officers and men on the battle ships to granting authority to build roads by the Government, at the expense of the Government, throughout the country?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Why, of course I do. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. I am not much surprised. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's opposition to the legislation proposed by me a while ago has forced the friends of that measure, which I prepared, in order to have it placed in the bill, to go to the other end of the Capitol for relief. Now, it is possible that over there, where this rule is not maintained that I seek to invoke against him now, he may obtain the relief that he is asking. I have no objection to that. But when we go to the Senate, I would rather that we both go, and that he have one proposition and I have the other, and we will have better means of agreeing. I want him to feel the force of the rule as it affected us personally.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has had long experience in this House. Does not the gentleman recognize the difference in the position of the chairman of a committee in charge of an appropriation bill making the point of order upon an amendment offered from the floor of the House in violation of the rules and inserting in a bill a provision which the committee has ordered inserted in the bill?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I take it that a member of the committee has as much right on this floor as the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly the gentleman has the same right to make the point of order.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I think when a bill comes from the committee a member has the right, when all points of order are reserved, to make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Of course he has a perfect right to make the point of order, but the gentleman was talking about reciprocity. I simply wanted to ask, would any chairman of a committee on appropriations last fifteen minutes in this House unless Members understood that the chairman of the committee would protect the House from legislation offered as amendments on the floor of the House, by making points of order against them.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. And when the chairman of the committee offers amendments in violation of the rule the Members of the House can protect the House.

Mr. MANN. That is perfectly proper.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Do I understand the gentleman to insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Each Navy mail clerk and assistant Navy mail clerk shall take the oath of office prescribed for employees of the postal service and shall give bond to the United States in the sum of $1,000 for the faithful performance of his duties as such clerk, and when necessity arises therefor any assistant Navy mail clerk may be required by the commanding officer of the vessel upon which he is stationed to perform the duties of Navy mail clerk.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. The same point of order is made to that as to the other section.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy mail clerks and assistant Navy mail clerks shall receive no compensation for their services from the Post-Office Department or postal service, but may be allowed additional compensation for such services by the Navy Department. Such clerks and assistant clerks shall be employees of the Navy Department and amenable in all respects to naval discipline, except that, as to their duties as Navy mail clerks and assistant Navy mail clerks, the commanding officers of the vessels upon which they are stationed shall require them to be governed by the postal laws and regulations of the United States.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I want to reserve the point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves the point of order.

Mr. KELIHER. I move to strike out the last word. It is understood——

Mr. MANN. I respectfully submit to the Chair, How can a gentleman move an amendment when a point of order is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. An amendment can not be offered while a point of order is reserved.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. I will make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, while that may be technically correct, the practice has uniformly been to permit gentlemen to speak to a pro forma amendment while the point of order is reserved. The gentleman from Tennessee now makes the point of order.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

That if the revenues of the Post-Office Department shall be insufficient to meet the appropriations made by this act, a sum equal to such deficiency of the revenue of said Department is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply said deficiencies in the revenues for the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1909, and the sum needed may be advanced to the Post-Office Department upon requisition of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. KELIHER. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I understand it is the intention of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, when this committee rises, to ask a separate vote upon the amendment voted into the bill upon the day before yesterday, whereby the committee increased or made provision for vitalizing the act which was passed last year that made provision for the $1,200 clerks in the city carrier service.

I want it understood that certain facts should be borne in mind. I believe it to be my duty to disabuse the minds of the members of the committee of the wrong impression that may have been left by a few statements made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], chairman of the Post-Office Committee, on the day before yesterday, in the course of his argument. In answering my charge that deception had been practiced, both upon the House and the carriers, the distinguished chairman stated that the committee had kept faith, and that they had but carried out the wishes of the father of the law, the First Assistant Postmaster-General. He said in that debate, quoting Mr. Hitchcock's statement before the Post-Office Committee last year:

All I ask as to the $1,200 grade is that it be authorized, and leave to Congress the determination of when and how many carriers shall be advanced into that grade.

Continuing, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] stated:

Instead of there being the practice of deceit or subterfuge, the provision was made with eyes open, not only of the committee of conference, but the First Assistant Postmaster-General himself.

Later on he said:

By withholding the appropriation from the $1,200 grade we have violated neither the provisions of the law nor the intent of its framers.

Mr. Chairman, I disagree with the chairman of the committee when he makes that statement, and I want to impress upon this House with all the emphasis I can command that when this committee failed to appropriate a sufficient amount to provide $1,200 carriers, they did not carry out the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster-General. I respectfully call attention to the hearings of the Post-Office Committee on page 178. I now refer to the hearings before that committee this year, where the chairman asks Mr. Hitchcock, First Assistant Postmaster-General, if in an estimate he had submitted he, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, was not providing for an increase of 50 per cent of the carriers now in the $1,100 grade to the $1,200 grade. At one hearing Chairman OVERSTREET said:

It also includes, I observe, the promotion of 50 per cent of the carriers from the $1,100 to the $1,200 grade.

Mr. Hitchcock, in answer to that specific inquiry, said:

Yes; it was our plan to provide for the promotion of 50 per cent of the carriers in that grade.

Now, I reiterate that if the chairman of the Post-Office and Post-Roads Committee had not broken faith, if he were carrying out the wish of the man whom he says originally presented this proposition, the House would not have adopted this amendment against the protest of the gentleman from Indiana, but would have sustained the committee.

I understand that the supporters of the rural free-delivery service feel that the city carriers are being promoted far in advance of what they are worth when we give them what the law entitles them to; but I say this to those gentlemen, that when their proposition came up last year we provided $900 a year for the rural carriers, and they are getting that $900. We also provided $1,200 for our carriers, but our carriers are not getting that $1,200. All this committee did when it voted the other day was to vitalize an act that you put upon the statute book last year. And, Mr. Chairman, if we, the friends of the city carriers, and you, the friends of the rural carriers, pull one against the other, your men will never get the increase which, I believe, they deserve, and our men will not get what the Congress contemplated giving and which the law now clearly provides. If you vote against us, we must, in order not to stultify ourselves, later vote against you. Consequently neither will get the increase that both deserve. I sincerely trust, in view of the fact that this statute providing $1,200 is the law of the land, that the House will not reject the amendment voted in by the committee, but will sustain us and give these men that to which they are entitled—$1,200 a year. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE. Most of the arguments directed against this measure during the debate have been based upon the statement that raises have not been made in other branches of the public service to the extent contemplated by this amendment.

Objection to legislation should be based upon a healthier reason than that. Even if it were true that inequities exist in other Departments, that should not be used to justify a continued injustice to a body of men whose efficiency and whose worth are known to every business establishment and every home in the great cities of this country.

Last year we authorized the creation of this class; and while we left to a future Congress the duty of providing the cost to make the increase effective, we are now confronted with the duty to appropriate it and grant the increase or repudiate what every letter carrier in the great cities of this country had a right to regard as a promise.

In winter snows or under summer's burning suns, in the pelting rains or biting winds, the letter carrier, with the regularity of the seasons, is found bearing his burdens and performing his duties.

The Government tolerates no excuse, but demands always the presence of these men at their post of duty, and it is but fair that we should reward them in accordance with our promise and in keeping with justice.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose, when the committee rises and reports this bill to the House to ask for a separate vote upon the amendment by which the letter carriers of the $1,100 grade would be promoted to the $1,200 grade. The committee when it recommended this bill to the House concluded to make no recommendations for increase of salaries. When I presented the bill in the first instance to the committee, I stated that, without foreclosing against any future acts and without passing upon the merits or demerits of the several propositions, in opposing the increases of the city letter carriers we were merely keeping faith with the policy to make no increases of salaries. There are meritorious claims on the part of the fourth-class postmasters, in my judgment, of much merit; and yet the committee decided not to take up that question this year. I believe I have stated, and I repeat it, that, in my judgment, the clerks in the post-office of the eleven-hundred-dollar grade are more deserving of promotion than are the letter carriers of the eleven-hundred-dollar grade; and yet the committee, Mr. Chairman, has made no provision for a general increase of salaries of that class of employees. The slight increase of 15 per cent was in order that they might appoint from the eleven-hundred-dollar grade to the superintendents of the small stations at the rate of $1,200 per year. Therefore we have been consistent upon our part in calling the attention of Members to the policy of not promoting anybody, whether he is a letter carrier, post-office clerk, railway mail clerk, rural carrier, or fourth-class postmaster; each one of these several divisions of employees has his particular advocate and champion.

As to whether or not we have violated the classification act, whether or not we have failed to keep faith, whether or not it is necessary to vitalize some legislation, is not before this committee. The classification act halted arbitrarily the promotion of letter carriers at the eleven-hundred-dollar grade, and I reassert, and challenge contradiction, that the First Assistant Postmaster, who went before the committee urging that legislation, specifically stated that he did not ask annual promotion of the letter carriers to the twelve-hundred-dollar grade, but he recommended the establishment of the grade, leaving Congress to decide when they should be promoted by making that promotion from the increased appropriation.

Mr. KELIHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I prefer that the gentleman would not interrupt me now. The First Assistant Postmaster-General was very solicitous about this classification, and I do him the credit to say that it was very largely due to his championship of the legislation that it finally became a law. And yet he, in the original recommendation, halted arbitrarily the promotion of the carriers at the thousand-dollar grade and not the eleven-hundred-dollar grade, and Congress in passing the legislation advanced one grade the arbitrary automatic promotion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope our friends from the large cities will not undertake in their zeal to gratify the desires of their constituencies and leave the impression that any of us is failing to keep faith with anybody. I claim just as much affection for and attention to the letter carriers of the Seventh Congressional District in Indiana as does the gentleman from Massachusetts; man for man they are the equal of the carriers in the Boston office, and I lament, Mr. Chairman, being obliged to oppose the urgent request of a number of my constituents in failing to make these promotions, but I must defend on behalf of the Government, whose services we are engaged in discharging. In view of the legislation last winter, one session ago, we went as far as was consistent when we increased the salary of these postal employees to the extent of $12,000,000.

I hope at no distant day in the future to see additional increase provided for them, but at this session of Congress, in my judgment, it is unwise to make the increase in salaries.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is a hundredfold more unwise to make a selection of one particular class of employees and increase their salaries and fail to increase the salaries of the others. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we can keep faith with ourselves and the Government, and be sustained in our recommendation for the increase of salaries, either to all or let all wait until we can consider whether or not the conditions of business and the revenues of the country will justify the additional increase. [Applause.]

Mr. POLLARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I will.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to inquire how much of the appropriation bill of last year increased the salary of letter carriers in cities of the first class?

Mr. TAWNEY. Two million four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. POLLARD. That applies to letter carriers in cities of the first class?

Mr. OVERSTREET. Yes. This amendment proposes an increase of salary of the eleven-hundred-dollar class, and they are all in cities of the first class and none of them are in cities of the second class.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is now pending.

Mr. SULZER. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. I do this for the purpose of saying a few words for the letter carriers. For years, Mr. Chairman, I have been in favor of the demands of the letter carriers of the country for just wages, and in several Congresses in the past I had the honor to introduce their bill for an increase of pay, because, in my judgment, I believed that their salaries were then, and are now, inadequate for the services they perform. Last year, after a long and bitter fight, the matter culminated in an amendment to the law fixing the grades and the salaries for the same, and it was understood when that amendment was adopted that the letter carriers' pay in the highest grade, beginning last July, should be $100 a month or $1,200 a year. When the time came around, however, the Post-Office authorities said Congress had made no provision for the payment of the salaries of the men in the highest grade in accordance with the law. In other words, Congress failed last year to appropriate the money to pay the letter carriers in accordance with the law. The law is on the statute books, and all we are asking Congress to do to-day is to pay these men in accordance with that law. There is no increase of pay. That is no increase of salary. The Government, through Congress, has put this law on the statute books, and that law says that the letter carriers in the highest grade shall receive $1,200 a year. Now, the friends of the letter carriers say to the committee, and we say to Congress, let us appropriate the necessary money in accordance with law to pay these men's salaries, just the same as we appropriate the necessary money to pay the salaries of every other employee of the Government. The adoption of that law last year was in reality a contract between the Government and the letter carriers, and we can not violate it now without disregarding the law, doing injustice to the letter carriers, and breaking the promises we then made to them.

Mr. Chairman, I plead to-day, as I have pleaded in the past, for justice for the deserving letter carriers. Their request for living wages is the demand of humanity. My heart goes out to them. I can not refrain from making this appeal in their behalf for simple justice.

There is not a man in this House who does not know that I am telling the truth when I say that these letter carriers are the hardest worked, the most patient, the most honest, the most zealous, the most untiring, and the most efficient men to-day in the employ of the Government; and yet they get the poorest pay. They are paid to-day just about the same wages they were paid twenty-five years ago, and everybody knows that the price of the necessaries of life under the Dingley tariff law has gone up over 30 per cent during the last ten years, and the letter carriers' wages remain just about the same as they were twenty-five years ago. [Applause.]

The letter carriers and the post-office clerks, and every other person whose salary is fixed, do not get any benefit from the Dingley high-tariff law, for nearly all the necessaries of life they have to buy now they have to pay about 30 per cent more by reason of this Republican tariff law than they did ten years ago.

Now, I say $1,200 a year for a letter carrier who has worked for the Government for years honestly and faithfully, in all kinds of weather, carrying the mail in sunshine and rain, in storm and distress, in the cold of winter and the heat of summer, is little enough. No man can decently bring up his family and educate his children on any less. How poorly, how miserably the letter carriers are paid! And yet, take them all in all, they are courteous, long suffering, uncomplaining, honest, assiduous, and industrious. How few of our citizens ever think of their trials, their wants, their health, their families and the little ones at home. At present they do not earn enough, no matter how long they have been in the service of the Government or how many hours a day they labor, to keep body and soul together. And what do they get? A mere pittance a month that is not enough to economically support one man. Let us be honest. Let us be just. Let us be true to the dictates of our nobler impulses, and if we are, this amendment—so honest and so just and so earnestly desired—will be adopted. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I trust that when this question comes up to-day in the House, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] moves, as he says he will, to disagree with the amendment the Committee of the Whole House put in the bill to pay these men their salaries at $1,200 a year, that every man who is in favor of the law, every man who believes in justice, and every man who wants in good faith to keep the contract, will vote against the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] and vote with the friends of the letter carriers in favor of the amendment put in the bill by the Committee of the Whole House to pay the letter carriers $1,200 a year, in accordance with the law we passed last year. [Applause.]

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I think it is not necessary to prolong debate on this subject, but it is fair to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL], who offered the amendment, that he should have a chance to speak upon it, and it is also fair that the opponents of the amendment should have the close, those offering it having the opening. I now ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto, which closes everything, be closed in ten minutes, and that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] have five minutes of that time and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] the remaining five minutes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman make it fifteen minutes, so that I may have a few minutes, and in that event I shall make no objection to his request?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the gentleman from Indiana will agree to that so that my colleague will have five minutes.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] be permitted to speak for five minutes, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL] for five minutes, and that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] for five minutes, and that then all debate close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph to the bill close in fifteen minutes, of which time the gentleman he has named shall, in the order he has named them, occupy five minutes each. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, the last Congress created a $1,200 grade in the letter-carrier service. It failed, however, to provide sufficient appropriation to pay that maximum salary. The amendment we adopted the other day in this Committee of the Whole simply makes last year's legislation effective and gives life to the statute. It will give to the highest grade of carriers a salary of $1,200, which, in my judgment, they certainly earn, and which in common justice they ought to have.

Again and again, in years past, we have appealed in the name of fairness for this increase. For over a quarter of a century the salaries remained unchanged. Bills to increase the pay so as to make it commensurate with the work done and to meet the increased cost of living were laid aside and smothered to death in the committee. I joined others in earnest protest, but in vain. Amendments in various Congresses, some of which I offered, were ruled out or rejected. At last, compelled by public sentiment to increase the pay, Congress last year created the grade but withheld the money required to meet that increase, and now notice is served on us that the question will be tested in the House as to whether we shall provide the funds that shall vitalize the law.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to express the hope that every gentleman who believes in fair play will vote to retain the amendment in the bill. I am glad to say that I have been an earnest and consistent friend of the letter carriers. When two days ago we adopted the amendment I was gratified, for I felt that, though long delayed, justice was being done. The result of long and continued effort was at last at hand. The ineffective law of last year was to be given life. Yet to-day the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Post-Office Committee [Mr. OVERSTREET], tells us it is unwise to make the appropriation. Why unwise? We created the grade. Surely every eleven-hundred-dollar man had a right to expect Congress would appropriate sufficient to cover the required increase. To withhold it now is not alone unfair and unwarranted, but seems to me to be a breach of faith.

These men are faithful in the performance of their work. They live in cities where the cost of living is high, where rents are on the increase, where the meager salaries they receive barely meet the cost of the actual necessities of life. This country is too large and too great to deal mean or niggardly with its employees, especially when they labor as hard and untiringly as do the postal men. They are in no pensioned class. When age comes on after years of service and earning capacity has ceased, the men are left, too oft, I regret to say, to their own sad plight. So then, let us deal fairly and uprightly with them. Do not let Congress tell them in one breath that they can be promoted to a $1,200 grade and in the same breath tell them it will not supply the necessary funds to make it good.

It will be unnecessary to discuss the matter further. I have so often argued the justice of the increase that I refrain from repetition. My time to discuss the matter is limited, but in the few moments allotted to me I do earnestly and urgently appeal to the membership of this House to retain the amendment. Pay these men what is just. Do not resort to subterfuge in withholding the money that the law contemplates shall be appropriated. And so I hope that if a vote is to be had on this matter again when we go back in the House the appropriation will be sustained, so that this deserving class of men may receive the salary that they so richly earn. [Applause.]

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], I desire to say I have no criticisms to make upon him nor upon the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. That committee honestly and conscientiously discharged its duties and agreed by a majority vote to report this bill. The committee was not unanimous so far as certain provisions contained in the bill are concerned, and one difference arose upon the proposition that we are considering to-day. I submit that when the Post-Office Committee had concluded to make no increase, that that committee can not rise higher than the Committee of the Whole House, that their recommendation can rise no higher than the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House to be made to the House. I offered the amendments to increase the pay of the clerks in the Post-Office Department. The committee of the Whole House saw fit to disagree with me upon that proposition. I offered the amendment to allow expenses to the railway mail clerks, and the Committee of the Whole disagreed with me upon that proposition. I submit to the will of the Committee of the Whole upon those propositions. That committee, however, agreed with me upon the amendment to increase the pay of letter carriers. It would seem that if the gentleman wanted to carry out the wishes of the Committee of the Whole, he ought not to insist upon the House rescinding the action of the Committee of the Whole.

Now, then, let us see. Every opportunity was afforded the gentleman, and the Committee of the Whole has spoken upon these propositions. We are going now into the House, where the gentleman intends to ask the previous question and avoid the further discussion upon the merits of this proposition, and intends to defeat this amendment. I said to you that we were not keeping faith with these employees in the Post-Office Department; that last year we said to them, "We are going to increase your salary," and we created the grades of $1,100 and $1,200, and we said, "We will make the appropriation in order that you may be raised into the $1,200 grade." In vain have I tried to get from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET] his reasons why this appropriation should not be made. All that he has said was that the receipts of the Department did not justify this raise.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. GOEBEL. That was the only reason that was urged, except that the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads had turned its face against every increase, whether right or wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the proposition we are now discussing is whether or not when a separate vote is demanded in the House on the amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole, increasing the salary of the letter carriers for the first-class offices of the United States, we should vote for or against the proposed increase.

The principal ground upon which this increase is demanded by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEBEL], and other gentlemen who favor this proposition, is that the existing law divides the postal service outside the city of Washington into six grades, and that the sixth grade in the letter-carrier service has never been appropriated for, and therefore the maximum amount that anyone in that service can receive is $1,100 a year.

Now, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] says he proposes to vitalize that law. Why did not Congress at the last session vitalize that law when it was enacted?

Mr. SULZER. The friends of that act thought Congress did do it.

Mr. TAWNEY. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the provision referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts does not bear the construction that he and the gentleman from Ohio contend for. It reads as follows:

That after June 30, 1907, clerks in offices of the first and second class, and carriers in the city delivery service, shall be divided into six grades, as follows: First grade, salary $600; second grade, salary $800; third grade, salary $900; fourth grade, salary $1,000; fifth grade, salary $1,100; sixth grade, salary $1,200.

Now, note this language:

Clerks and carriers at first-class offices shall be promoted successively to the fifth grade and clerks and carriers at second-class offices successively to the fourth grade.

That means, Mr. Chairman, that the question of when these carriers should be promoted to the sixth grade was left to the discretion of Congress. And any time that Congress should provide the necessary appropriation they could be advanced to the sixth grade, and not until then. All of the inferior grades, however, were advanced successively until they reached the fifth grade, and the compensation fixed by Congress for that grade is $1,100.

If you propose to increase or to vitalize this law in respect to the carriers in the first-class cities or in the offices of the first class, why do you not apply your provision for an increase of salaries to the clerks in these several post-offices—clerks who work from twelve to fifteen hours a day; clerks whose duties require a much higher degree of intelligence and education than is required of letter carriers? Why do you not extend your proposed increase to the railway postal clerks, or why did you vote down the amendment to increase the salaries of these, the poorest paid and hardest worked employees in the Government service? It is not consistency you demand or want, it is not the vitalization of existing law the gentleman wants; it is the vitalization of votes that gentlemen seek in urging this increase of salary to the carriers in the large cities of the country. No man can justify such discrimination against the large body of post-office employees, who are infinitely more worthy of consideration than are the carriers in our large cities.

If there is an aristocracy in the post-office service, so far as compensation is concerned, it consists of the letter carriers of the United States. They are receiving more compensation now and are working shorter hours than any other class of Government employees, either in the post-office service or outside of the post-office service outside of the District of Columbia. Mr. Chairman, we are about to make a favorable report to the House on this bill and recommend the passage of the largest appropriation bill that the Congress of the United States has ever passed. This bill exceeds the current law in the amount of $8,674,199. It carries, without this proposed increase of $1,185,000, an aggregate appropriation of $221,765,392. This fact alone, in view of diminished and diminishing revenues, should arrest the attention of this House, as it will the attention of the country. It should prompt Members to consider their duty to the Government before adding to the enormous aggregate of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, it can not be claimed that because we are unwilling to increase the salary of the class 6 carriers at this time we are doing any injustice to them at all. This Congress began the consideration of appropriations with the determination that under the existing revenue it would be impossible to provide any increases of salary for the employees in the civil establishment of the Government; and thus far we have adhered to this purpose. There has been no increases of salary in any of the appropriation bills that Congress has passed except in isolated cases where there were exceptional circumstances. To those who are disposed to criticise this House, let me call to their attention what we have done within the last twelve months for the letter carriers and post-office clerks in the postal service outside of Washington in respect to the increase of their salaries. At the last session we increased the salaries of the railway mail clerks $1,500,000. We increased the salaries of the rural free-delivery carriers $5,600,000; we increased the salaries of the clerks in post-offices $2,500,000; we increased the salaries of the letter carriers $2,400,000, making an aggregate increase for these several branches of the postal service of $12,000,000 at one session of Congress. And this bill carries an increase in salaries for letter carriers beyond the amount of this amendment of $1,300,000.

In conclusion, therefore, I submit that this House is not justified in increasing the deficit for the next fiscal year by adding to this bill $1,185,000 in order to increase the salaries of a now favored class of post-office employees.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had directed him to report the bill H. R. 18347, the post-office appropriation bill, with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any of the amendments?

Mr. OVERSTREET. I demand a separate vote on the amendment in lines 22 and 23, on page 14 of the bill.

Mr. GOEBEL. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. KELIHER. On that I ask for a call of the roll.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the vote will be taken on the remaining amendments in gross.

No other separate vote was demanded.

The other amendments were agreed to in gross.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment on which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, in lines 22 and 23, strike out "26,650,000" and insert "27,825,000."

Mr. KELIHER. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 135, nays 126, answered "present" 11, not voting 116, as follows:

Mr. LAFEAN with Mr. CANDLER.

Mr. LOWDEN with Mr. SAUNDERS.

Mr. DUNWELL with Mr. WATKINS.

On this vote:

Mr. BARTHOLDT with Mr. SCOTT (on carriers' salary, Mr. BARTHOLDT in favor of increase, Mr. SCOTT against increase).

Mr. WALDO with Mr. LANGLEY (on carriers' increase, Mr. WALDO in favor of increase, Mr. LANGLEY against increase).

Mr. TOWNSEND with Mr. MCCALL (on carriers' salary, Mr. TOWNSEND against increase, Mr. MCCALL in favor of increase).

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. WALDO] has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. SHERMAN]. He has not.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am paired with him, and if he were present he would vote "aye." I voted "no," and I will withdraw my vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. LANGLEY, and he voted "present," as above recorded.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I suggest a recapitulation of the vote before it is announced, and ask for order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is entitled to a recapitulation, but the Chair will say that the vote is not close.

Mr. SULZER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I was informed that there was only a difference of two.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas are 136 and the nays are 126. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to and lay that motion on the table. The gentleman from Indiana is on the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York moves to reconsider the vote and that that motion lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time and passed.

PENSION OF WIDOWS AND MINOR CHILDREN.

The Speaker laid before the House the bill (H. R. 15653) "An act to increase the pension of widows of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war," with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, one of the amendments in the bill affects a matter over which the Committee on Pensions has jurisdiction, and I hope that a member from the Committee on Pensions will be appointed as one of the conferees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce the conferees later.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the House nonconcurred in the Senate amendments to the widows' pension bill, and I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to reconsider the vote by which the House disagreed to the Senate amendments and asked for a conference.

Mr. PAYNE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman from New York moves to lay that motion on the table.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that bills now in order on the Private Calendar may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar in order to-day may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. CAPRON, will take the chair.

HENRY M'CALL.

The first pension business was the bill (H. R. 3510) granting an increase of pension to Henry McCall.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry McCall, late of Company K, Fifteenth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 8 strike out the word "thirty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-four."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

FRANK Z. CURRY.

The next pension business was the bill (H. R. 2395) granting an increase of pension to Frank Z. Curry.

The bill was read, as follows:

JOHN SHAUGHNESSY.

The next business upon the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5297) entitled "A bill to complete the naval record of John Shaughnessy."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a point of order on the bill. However, possibly the bill had better be read, as the title does not disclose the nature of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to so amend the naval record of John Shaughnessy, late landsman, United States Navy, on U. S. S. Brooklyn, as to show him honorably discharged, to date from October 9, 1864.

The following amendment was read:

Line 6, after the word "him," strike out the word "honorably."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that under the rule this bill is properly up for consideration at this time.

Mr. MANN. If it is a bill to remove the charge of desertion it will be in order.

Mr. CALDER rose.

Mr. MANN. Is this the gentleman's bill?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I thought it was another bill. I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 14, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RELIEF OF TOBACCO GROWERS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17520, and that it be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill and that it be considered in the House. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17520) for the relief of tobacco growers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17520) for the relief of tobacco growers.

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision 9 of section 3244 of the United States Revised Statutes, as amended by section 69 of the act entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes," approved August 28, 1894, is hereby further amended so as to read as follows:

"Every person whose business it is to manufacture tobacco or snuff for himself, or who employs others to manufacture tobacco or snuff, whether such manufacture be by cutting, pressing, grinding, crushing, or rubbing of any raw or leaf tobacco, or otherwise preparing raw or leaf tobacco, or manufactured or partially manufactured tobacco or snuff, or the putting up for use or consumption of scraps, waste, clippings, stems, or deposits of tobacco resulting from any process of handling tobacco, or by the working or preparation of leaf tobacco, tobacco stems, scraps, clippings, or waste, by sifting, twisting, screening, or any other process, shall be regarded as a manufacturer of tobacco: Provided, That unstemmed tobacco in the natural leaf and not manufactured or altered in any manner shall not be subject to any internal-revenue tax or charge of any kind whatsoever, and it shall be lawful for any person to buy and sell such unstemmed tobacco in the leaf without payment of tax of any kind: Provided further, That any person who sells natural leaf tobacco to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars shall be deemed and considered a dealer in leaf tobacco and become subject to all the provisions, rules, and regulations of subsection 6 of section 3244, United States Revised Statutes, as amended by section 14, act of March 1, 1879, and also as amended by the act of March 3, 1883, and, further, shall be subject to all the provisions of section 3360, United States Revised Statutes, as amended by section 14, act of March 1, 1879, and of sections 3359 and 3391, United States Revised Statutes: And provided further, That farmers and growers of tobacco may sell leaf tobacco of their own growth and raising to manufacturers of tobacco, snuff, or cigars without being considered leaf dealers or manufacturers of tobacco and shall not be subject to the sections of the law and amendments thereof above named."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, just one word. This bill was passed in the last Congress and is reported to this Congress unanimously by the Committee on Ways and Means. The bill was drawn originally by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Yerkes, and the purpose of the bill, in short, is to relieve the farmer who raises tobacco from a status under the law of a manufacturer or dealer, and to relieve him, therefore, to that extent of tax.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice is hereby authorized during the Sixtieth Congress to have such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

HEARINGS ON THE PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a print of a thousand copies of the hearings before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations on the pension appropriation bill for the year 1909.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for a print of a thousand copies of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on the pension appropriation bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE ACROSS MOBILE RIVER, MOBILE, ALA.

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17311) to authorize the Pensacola, Mobile and New Orleans Railway Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Alabama, to construct a bridge over and across the Mobile River and its navigable channels on a line approximately east of the north boundary line of the city of Mobile, Ala.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Pensacola, Mobile and New Orleans Railway Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Alabama be, and is hereby, authorized to construct, operate, and maintain a bridge, and its approaches thereto, across the Mobile River and its navigable channels, in the counties of Baldwin and Mobile, in the State of Alabama, at a point approximately east of the north boundary line of the city of Mobile, to be approved by the Secretary of War, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, and repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

BUREAU OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia rises to a privileged motion, which he will state.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for immediate consideration by the House of the resolution, now being privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the consideration of the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 286.

Whereas the act of February 14, 1903, establishing the Department of Commerce and Labor contains the following provision:

"SEC. 6. That there shall be in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be called the Bureau of Corporations, and a Commissioner of Corporations who shall be the head of said bureau, to be appointed by the President, who shall receive a salary of $5,000 per annum. There shall also be in said bureau a deputy commissioner who shall receive a salary of $3,500 per annum, and who shall in the absence of the Commissioner act as, and perform the duties of, the Commissioner of Corporations, and who shall also perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or by the said Commissioner. There shall also be in the said bureau a chief clerk and such special agents, clerks, and other employees as may be authorized by law.

"The said Commissioner shall have power and authority to make, under the direction and control of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, diligent investigation into the organization, conduct, and management of the business of any corporation, joint stock company, or corporate combination engaged in commerce among the several States and with foreign nations, excepting common carriers subject to 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and to gather such information and data as will enable the President of the United States to make recommendations to Congress for legislation for the regulation of such commerce, and to report such data to the President from time to time as he shall require; and the information so obtained or as much thereof as the President may direct shall be made public.

"In order to accomplish the purposes declared in the foregoing part of this section, the said Commissioner shall have and exercise the same power and authority in respect to corporations, joint stock companies, and combinations subject to the provisions hereof, as is conferred on the Interstate Commerce Commission in said 'Act to regulate commerce' and the amendments thereto in respect to common carriers so far as the same may be applicable, including the right to subpœna and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence and to administer oaths. All the requirements, obligations, liabilities, and immunities imposed or conferred by said 'Act to regulate commerce' and by 'An act in relation to testimony before the Interstate Commerce Commission,' and so forth, approved February 11, 1893, supplemental to said 'Act to regulate commerce,' shall also apply to all persons who may be subpœnaed to testify as witnesses or to produce documentary evidence in pursuance of the authority conferred by this section:"

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the House all such information and data reported to him under the above provision of law and not yet made public by him.

Mr. HEPBURN. I raise the point of order against the consideration of that resolution. It is not privileged; and the privileged character of the resolution is destroyed by the preamble.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Georgia, briefly.

Mr. HARDWICK. I contend that the point of order the gentleman raises is not good against this resolution, for the reason that the preamble recites nothing but provisions of law, and then the resolution simply requests the President of the United States to give to this House such information as has been collected under that law.

The resolution is not subject to the point of order, and the preamble simply recites what is the existing law, so that the attention of the President may be directed to the precise information the House wants to get. I believe that a careful and fair examination of the resolution will compel the Chair to that opinion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the rule is not affected in any way by the character of the preamble or by the matter that it recites. It does recite, at least, a fact of legislation.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The gentleman would not think that because you recited the provisions of a law that had been enacted by Congress you were making a statement of fact.

Mr. HEPBURN. Undoubtedly, if you do it in the character and nature of a preamble.

Mr. HARDWICK. When you recite just what the law is?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I can not recall exactly the wording of the resolution, but the law which was enacted provided that the President should make public such information as he should deem proper collected by the Bureau of Corporations. I take it that it is not within the province of the House, and hence it would not be a privileged resolution, to ask the President to do more than is provided by the law. Just what the form of the resolution is I do not now remember.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What harm is there in asking the President of the United States to give to Congress any information he may have, no difference how he got it, provided it is not incompatible with the interests of the public service?

Mr. TAWNEY. Because the law expressly provides that it shall not be given to the public.

Mr. MANN. I was discussing the point of order, as to whether this would be a privileged resolution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This resolution does not do anything except recite the law, so that the President may know what he is being asked to do.

Mr. MANN. The President is supposed to know the law as well as the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is a very violent presumption. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. My observation has been that the President is far better posted on the law than is that side of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think you have made very poor observations.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be looking toward the President, but I am looking more toward that side of the House. Perhaps we both observe the ignorance that we all have in reference to the law. Now, the law provided what the President should make public. It is wholly within the discretion of the President. The matter was well considered. Here is a proposition requesting the President to make public to the House information which (I suppose that is the object) he has not made public under the law, because in his compliance with the law he did not choose to make it public. The law which the gentleman recites contemplates the gathering of confidential information, not to be made public, and leaves it within the discretion of the President to decide what information shall be made public. Now, as I say, I do not remember the exact wording of this resolution——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. MANN. I always do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the gentleman had completed his remarks, and I was claiming recognition from the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not recall the fact——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I wish to ask the gentleman if he does not recall the fact that on January 29, 1906, the present occupant of the Chair ruled on a privileged resolution offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] that a resolution of this character was privileged?

Mr. MANN. While that may be true, I do not recall the fact, and I do not even recall the exact wording of the present resolution. Much less do I recall the exact wording of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution merely calls for certain information, and the preamble does nothing except indicate the character of the information called for, to wit, such information as has been collected under the operation of a certain law. Now, the parliamentary rule that if the resolution be privileged its privileged character can be destroyed by something in the preamble not privileged does not apply in this case, because the preamble merely makes that certain which is required to be made certain in asking for information, to wit, the character of the information asked for. And certainly there is a right to indicate the character of the information, the special sort of information demanded, by saying it is the information provided to be collected under a particular statute.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] said a moment ago that on the 29th of January the Speaker held a similar resolution under the same law to be privileged. I am sure it would edify the House if the gentleman would cite the precedent.

Mr. HARDWICK. On January 29, 1906, a resolution was offered on this floor by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE], calling on the President of the United States for all facts within his knowledge as to the existence of a combination between certain railroad companies in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. My recollection is that this resolution referred specifically to the very act establishing the Department of Commerce and Labor. The Speaker then indicated that the resolution of the gentleman from Texas was in order and was privileged, and while I do not think the point of order was insisted upon, the RECORD, page 1701, of that session will show that I am substantially correct in my contention that the Speaker then indicated that, in his opinion, the resolution was privileged.

The SPEAKER. Was the question raised as to the preamble or was there a preamble?

Mr. HARDWICK. No; there was no preamble. But I want to emphasize the contention I made in the beginning, that I have not undertaken to do anything except to identify the information I ask for. I simply have described the law under which it is collected, and then I ask for such information as he has under that law.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the Chair to the resolution disconnected from the preamble, to show how exceedingly important the preamble is. The gentleman from Georgia says there is nothing in the preamble but a recitation of the law. If you were to strike out the preamble, there would be nothing left. Let me read the resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the House all such information and data reported to him under the above provision of law and not yet made public by him.

Now, strike out the preamble, and what is there left of this resolution? What matter is it that you want to report? It is an absurdity if you strike out the preamble, which shows its marked importance. It is the important thing. If you strike it out, you have nothing left that the President can act upon. It identifies the information you want, and without the preamble the resolution is meaningless.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the point made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] assumes that the mere fact that there is a preamble to a resolution destroys its privilege. Of course that is not so. Unless the preamble contains matter which, if contained in the resolution itself, would destroy the privilege of the resolution, the preamble does not destroy the privileged character of the resolution. If the resolution be privileged and it be proposed to strike out the preamble, it is very easy to amend the resolution itself so as to set forth specifically the law to which reference is made in the preamble.

But I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that if, instead of this resolution being in the form of a preamble and resolution, the entire matter contained in the preamble were contained in the resolution itself, the resolution would not be subject to a point of order. The preamble does not recite any matter that is not privileged. It recites the law, perhaps with a little more verbiage than is necessary to identify it, but it recites the law under which certain facts are collected by a certain Bureau of the Government and communicated to the President.

This resolution merely asks that the facts collected under a certain Bureau of the Government and communicated to the President be communicated to this House, if not incompatible with the public interests. A resolution of inquiry directed to the President is privileged so long as it calls for some facts within his knowledge. A careful examination of the preamble itself discloses the recitation of no facts other than those that are required to point out specifically the character of the information desired by the resolution.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to say that the precedent he referred to was contained in the proceedings of the House of January 26, 1906. I have sent for that volume and do not find it.

Mr. HARDWICK. It was January 29, 1906.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. This resolution was introduced under clause 5 of rule 22, which is as follows:

All resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Executive Departments shall be reported to the House within one week after presentation.

There is nothing specific in the rule that makes the resolution privileged, but there has been a long line of decisions respecting resolutions of this kind that fairly well settle this point of order, and it has been held in the rulings of the Chair from time to time that if there is anything in the resolution, or in the preamble, for that matter, because the resolution and the preamble would have to be voted upon separately, which is aside from the purposes of a resolution of inquiry, then that destroys the privilege. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] refers the Chair to a decision which was made in 1906, and which is to be found on page 1701 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of date January 29, and the Chair will ask the Clerk to read the resolution in the case referred to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to report to the House of Representatives, for its information, all the facts within the knowledge of the Interstate Commerce Commission which shows or tends to show that there exists at this time, or heretofore within the last twelve months has existed, a combination or arrangement between the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, the Pennsylvania Company, the Norfolk and Western Railway Company, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, the Northern Central Railway Company, and the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, or any two or more of said railroad companies, in violation of the act passed July 2, 1890, and entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," or acts amendatory thereof.

The SPEAKER. Upon this resolution it appears that no point of order was made. After some consideration, the resolution was amended from a technical standpoint by practically unanimous consent. There is an absence of preamble entirely in this resolution, and the only reference to law in the resolution is to be found in the language:

In violation of the act passed July 2, 1890.

The resolution under consideration abounds in preamble; there is much of quotation marks in it; and there is something in the preamble not in quotation. On page 2 of the resolution we find this language:

And to gather such information and data as will enable the President of the United States to make recommendations to Congress for legislation for the regulation of such commerce, and to report such data to the President from time to time as he shall require; and the information so obtained, or as much thereof as the President may direct, shall be made public.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I just want to call the attention of the Speaker to the fact that my contention is that the Speaker takes judicial cognizance of what the law is—that every bit of that preamble is the law as it is written.

The SPEAKER. Precisely. The gentleman so says, but suppose the gentleman is in error? These words that the Chair has read are not even in quotation marks; but if they were, after all, it is a question of fact as to whether the law is correctly quoted in the preamble.

Mr. HARDWICK. But, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman a little later on if he desires to be heard. If this resolution were before the House for consideration, the vote would have first to be taken upon the resolution itself, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the House all such information and data reported to him under the above provision of law, and not yet made public by him.

If that resolution itself were adopted, it identifies nothing. In the opinion of the Chair it would be unavailing. But suppose the resolution is adopted, and then the vote comes upon the preamble, which professes to recite the law in part and in part not to recite the law. Let us assume that the preamble is voted down, as it might or might not be. The House would then be in the condition of having adopted a resolution that is unavailing. The resolution reported by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE], which has just been read by the Clerk, and which was adopted by the House, was complete within itself. The Chair, from time to time, under the rule read a moment ago by the Chair, has held matter of this kind to be privileged, those rulings at all times being subject to ratification or rejection by the House, and that leads the Chair to the opinion that the value of the resolution is to call for information, and that it should be strictly construed in the interests of the privileges of the House in order that the rule may be preserved. Therefore the Chair is of opinion, for the reasons assigned, that the preamble destroys the privilege of the resolution.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Chair hear me just a moment before deciding finally?

The SPEAKER. Oh, with pleasure.

Mr. HARDWICK. In the first place, Mr. Speaker, the proposition that the Chair suggests would always be true whenever there was more than one section to a bill or resolution. If some of the sections were adopted and others were not adopted, the bill or resolution might not have any sense, but it is not to be assumed that the House will do that sort of a thing.

The SPEAKER. And yet the gentleman will remember that the matter is not divisible.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not see the difference whether it is in the preamble or in two or three sections, but I shall not elaborate upon that. I am convinced myself that I am right about that, and of course if I can not convince the Speaker, that is my misfortune and not his fault.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one other proposition. So far as the quotation of law is concerned, I have always understood it that the Speaker of the House or any court should take judicial cognizance of what the law is, and it is not a question of fact as to what the law is.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman will notice that this preamble throws the burden upon the House to make an investigation of facts for itself as to whether the preamble correctly recites the law or as to whether the words not in quotations, heretofore read by the Chair, are a part of the law or whether they are aliunde to the law, and such an investigation, whether it be little or much, is a distinct matter to which the House should not be brought in considering a privileged resolution of inquiry. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

LEGISLATION CONCERNING INDIANS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the Clerk to read the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bills H. R. 18617, providing for the disposal of the interests of Indian minors in real estate in Yakima Indian Reservation, Wash., and H. R. 17717, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents in fee to purchasers of Indian lands under any law now existing or hereafter enacted, were erroneously referred to the Union Calendar, and the Chair directs that the bills be placed upon the House Calendar, where they properly belong.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 16268) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. KEIFER. And pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the time given for general debate upon this bill be equally divided between the majority and the minority sides of the House, and that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BOWERS] control one half of the time and that I may control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] asks unanimous consent that the time may be equally divided between the majority and the minority for general debate, and that the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Mississippi control the time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16268), the pension appropriation bill, making appropriation for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, with Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to have the report accompanying this bill read now. I do not propose at present to undertake to make any speech on the subject of this bill. It appropriates $150,000,000 for the purpose of paying all classes of pensioners. This is the largest pension bill ever reported in the Congress of the United States. It is in exact accordance with the estimate of the Pension Bureau. There are other appropriations in the bill relating to the cost of paying pensions, and there is a material reduction in such appropriations looking to the matter of changing the pension agencies. But I wish to say now that I expect to speak on that subject later and also that my colleague [Mr. BOWERS] on the committee, I understand, desires to do so later.

At present I yield forty-five minutes of time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNON].

Mr. BANNON. Mr. Chairman, the history of the Republican party during the past half century has been the history of our country for that period; and the history of Ohio is the history of the Republican party. Ohio is proud of her history, her traditions, and her citizenship. Her leadership in the many varied fields of human endeavor has been conspicuous, and as an exponent of Republican principles and Republican doctrines that State is not surpassed by any of her sisters. Ohio is proud not only of the great men she has given to the world, but of the diversity of her resources. These have enabled that State to take its accorded rank in the history of our times. Ohio is endowed with a wealth of agricultural domain. Her broad and fertile valleys, her uplands, and her hillsides have reached such a state of development in agriculture that Ohio now stands third in the rank of States in the improvement of her farm lands, and we give to the foreign and domestic markets annually one of the largest crops of corn, wheat, oats, and other cereals produced by the States of this Union. In the production of sheep, cattle, horses, and, in fact, all farm products Ohio is well up in the list, and her record in agriculture is one of which the nation is proud. The value of all the farm property of Ohio is equal to the total value of farm property of the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, Mississippi, South Carolina, and North Carolina. The fifty-two Democratic Representatives in Congress from those States urge upon Congress and the country that the tariff is a system whereby the farmer of the South is taxed for the benefit of the manufacturers of the East and North. The Republicans of Ohio and their sixteen Republican Representatives always have and, I hope, always will repudiate that heresy. They accept the better and the more logical view of the question, which is that when the industries of America are running on full time and paying American wages to American workmen not only are these industries and their millions of employees prosperous, but the millions of Americans engaged in the pursuits of agriculture receive the highest prices for the products of their soil and their labor and participate in the prosperity enjoyed by all the country.

I will carry the comparison one step farther. The total value of all the farm property of the States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia is equaled by two Western States—Illinois and Iowa; yet one hundred and two of the one hundred and nine Representatives from the States I first named, upon the ground that the tariff discriminates against the farmer, contend that the industries of the North and East should be crippled by a material reduction of the tariff on the products produced by them, while thirty Republican Representatives from the two States last named believe in the doctrine, "Plant the factory by the farm," upon the sound reasoning that the farm furnishes a very large percentage of the raw material fashioned by the factory into the finished products, and that those engaged in industrial pursuits are the best customers of those engaged in agriculture. This has become the settled policy of this country. It is a Republican policy. Under it manufacture has continuously moved westward and southward, and those sections of our country are destined to equal the North and East in manufacture.

The Democratic platforms of many Presidential campaigns not only declared for a tariff for revenue only, but even as late as 1904 denounced the Republican principle of protection as a fraud and a robbery. Yet under this very system of protection the States that furnish no votes in favor of protection, but do furnish the bulwark of the opposition to it, have shown most wonderful progress. During the decade from 1890 to 1900 the value of products manufactured in Alabama increased from fifty-one million to eighty million dollars, or one and a half times. In Arkansas the increase was from twenty-two million to forty-five million dollars, or more than double; in Florida, from eighteen million to thirty-six million dollars, or twice as much; in Louisiana, from fifty-eight millions to one hundred and twenty-one millions, or more than double; in Mississippi, from nineteen millions to forty millions, again more than double; in North Carolina, from forty millions to ninety-five millions, doubled again and then some; in South Carolina, from thirty-two millions to fifty-eight millions; in Tennessee, from seventy-two millions to one hundred and eight millions; in Texas, from seventy millions to one hundred and nineteen millions; in Virginia, from eighty-eight millions to one hundred and thirty-two millions. Yet the Democratic Representatives from these States and the Democrats from these States upon every occasion denounce protection as a robbery, and this in the face of the magnificent record it has made for them.

The development of these States is an achievement of which we are all proud. They are no longer agricultural only, but are manufacturing States also, and with their diversity of interests serving them so well they should cease denouncing as a robbery the prime source of their progress. If protection is a robbery, it is wrong. To receive stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, is wrong. Denunciation of the robber does not justify the receiver of the stolen property, and the States I have named are there with the goods. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] In a speech on the floor of this House a Representative from the State of Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] said, on February 12 last:

> Mr. Chairman, stranger than fiction, more marvelous than romance, has been the wonderful history of American industrial development. When this Government was established we were, commercially and industrially, the weakest of the weak. To-day we are the strongest of the strong. Then we were the poorest of the poor. Now we are the richest of the rich. Then we were almost entirely an agricultural people. Now we are not only the leading agricultural, but also the leading manufacturing nation of earth. In the production of all of the great food staples we are easily first. In the production of silver we lead the world. We are now second, and are rapidly advancing to the first place among the nations in the production of gold. In the production of most of the great raw materials we lead the world.

Yes! And he might have added that at the time this Government was established, and when we were commercially and industrially the weakest of the weak, the first tariff act was passed. That was in 1789. That act was approved by President Washington. It took effect on July fourth. In its preamble it specifies three things that made the levying of a duty on goods, wares, and merchandise imported necessary, and these were the support of the Government, the payment of our debts, and the encouragement and protection of our manufactures. Now, the fact that we have grown under this financial policy and have become what the gentleman from Georgia says we are is given as a reason by him for advocating a tariff which shall not be along protective lines. In other words, he advises us to leave the old and well-known channel, disregard the beacon lights which more than a century of experience have proven to point the true way to a safe and successful voyage, and enter upon a course which always has and always will be attended with disaster and the wrecking of the fortunes and opportunities of the American people. The principle of protection has been the policy of the Republican party since its organization, and it is its principle to-day.

But I started in to talk to you about Ohio. We are not only proud of Ohio in agriculture, but in her manufactures as well. With her great systems of water transportation on the north and south, her network of railways extending like a spider's web all over the State, her coal and iron, her central location, Ohio is one of the workshops of the world. In iron and steel Ohio has held second rank since 1870. From 1890 to 1900 Ohio's production of iron and steel doubled, and from 1900 to 1905 it increased 10 per cent. From Bulletin No. 58, issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor, giving the census of manufactures for 1905, I learn that the cost of both material and labor in Ohio blast furnaces increased materially. The quantity of ore used in 1905 over 1900 increased 22.4 per cent, but the cost of this ore increased 54.7 per cent; while the quantity of fluxing materials increased 16.9 per cent, their cost increased 34.3 per cent; and the quantity of the coke used increased 17.7 per cent, yet its cost increased 53.5 per cent.

There is a demand from all the Democrats and some Republicans for a revision of the iron and steel schedules of the Dingley law on account of the high price of those products. If the cost of labor and material increased, as they did, the product must necessarily increase in price. If the duties are decreased so that competition from abroad becomes profitable to the foreign manufacturer of iron and steel he will at once invade our market, and the result must inevitably be that either he will sell his products in large quantities in our market or the prices of the labor and the materials used in making these products will have to be reduced in order that the home manufacturer may meet and exclude his foreign competitor. The Republican party may be relied upon to protect this industry from foreign competition, thereby insuring to our workmen the standard of American wage and American living. If a lower level is established the hardship will fall most heavily on the wage-earner and upon the man who feeds him.

In foundry and machine-shop products Ohio ranks second; in her flour and grist mills, third; in the manufacture of boots and shoes, third; in railroad repair shops, seventh; in clay products, first; in planing mills, tenth; in carriages and wagons, first; in material for carriages and wagons, first; in furniture, fifth; in agricultural implements, third; in paper and wood pulp, sixth; in glass, third; in cash registers, first; in paints, fourth. In 1905 the number of wage-earners engaged in manufacture in Ohio was more than 364,000, and to them was paid as wages more than $182,000,000, and the value of the products of our manufacturing industries was more than $960,000,000. That labor participated in the prosperity enjoyed by all manufacturing industries is shown by the fact that while the percentage of increase between 1900 and 1905 of the number of wage-earners so engaged was 18 per cent and the value of the products 28 per cent, the total of the wages paid these employees increased 33 per cent. It is upon this magnificent record that the Republican party will successfully appeal to the electorate of Ohio in the next Presidential campaign.

No schedule in the tariff law is denounced by free traders so vehemently and at the same time so unreasonably as the iron and steel schedule. That industry is one of the most important in Ohio. The ninety establishments manufacturing iron and steel in Ohio produced in 1905 products equal in value to one-sixth of the total of all the industries of that State. That industry is first in rank in Ohio. In 1905 the value of the product of our blast furnaces was $40,862,451, and that of our steel works and rolling mills $111,996,673, or in all $152,859,124. More than 33,000 wage-earners were employed, to whom was paid more than $2,000,000 in wages. While there was a slight decrease in the number of wage-earners for 1905 as compared with 1900, about 1½ per cent, nevertheless the wages increased more than 12 per cent. Every manufacturer in Ohio engaged in this industry and every wage-earner employed in the furnaces, mills, and foundries knows that their interests are safe and will be protected by a Republican Congress and that their interests are jeopardized and in danger with Democracy in control. The furnace men, mill men, and foundry men of the Ohio Valley, of Cleveland, of Cincinnati, of Columbus, and of Youngstown remember too well the four years from 1893 to 1897, when their mills and foundries were idle and the fires of their furnaces were out. Deprived of their market, stagnation and disaster stared them in the face; and for the strong men willing to work there was none, and for their homes and families they were unable to supply the comforts and luxuries available to them during the past ten years.

In the nation this industry has made a most wonderful and marked growth. In 1861, when the Republican party first came into power, we were dependent upon Europe for our iron and steel. We had the ore, and we had the coal and the other materials necessary in this industry. By an adherence to our protective policy these plants increased in number and grew in size, so that to-day, instead of being dependent upon Europe for these products, we are ourselves furnishing them to the world. In 1887 our exports of iron and steel products were valued at $16,250,000; in 1897, $63,000,000; and in 1907, $200,000,000. Expressed in percentage for these twenty years, it is 1,131 per cent increase. Almost one-half of our exports for 1907 were machinery of various kinds. Our home market is supplied by our home industries, and the tremendous growth of this market is apparent to all. But the great growth of this industry, its marvelous extension and development, of which we are all so proud, has proven to be the source of the attacks made upon it; and because it has prospered, and because it has grown, and because it has been successful it is threatened with the infliction of a penalty by a very material reduction in the duty. Success and greatness always have brought and always will bring enemies. It is so in business, and it is so with men. Industries that become great in the world are the center of hostile criticism and attack, just as the public men who achieve distinction and honor bring upon themselves opposition, slander, and even hatred that otherwise would not be theirs. If the duties affecting this industry are to be revised, it must be done by its friends and not by its enemies, by Republicans and not by Democrats. The wage-earners in Ohio employed in these industries and the men engaged in operating them will again next November express their confidence in that party whose principles have made possible the development of this production, and they will do their part toward delegating the work of revision, if revision must come, to the Republican party.

The growth of the annual production of steel rails is one of the results of the Republican protective system. From an output of 2,277 tons in 1867, our production has grown to three and one-half million tons in 1907. The price has been reduced during the same period from $166 per ton to $28 per ton. The duty has been reduced from 45 per cent ad valorem in 1871, or an equivalent of $46 per ton, to $28 per ton from 1875, and then to $17 per ton from 1883, $13.44 per ton from 1890, and $7.84 per ton from 1894. Under the operation of the Republican protective system we have increased the production, reduced the price, and reduced the duty. Of our production of rails last year we exported 338,906 tons, or about 10 per cent. Now, the fact that this 10 per cent of steel rails produced in American mills by American workmen who were paid an American wage may have been sold abroad for 5 per cent less than the domestic price is seized upon by the Democratic party as a point for attack upon the iron and steel schedule and is urged as a reason why our tariff act should be a revenue measure only and not a protective measure. It forms the basis of Democratic attacks upon the United States Steel Corporation—the "steel trust," as they call it—and all other iron and steel industries.

In answer to them I would say that while the domestic price of Great Britain is $31.50 per ton, their export price is $25; in Germany the domestic price is $30 per ton and the export price $24; in France the domestic price is $31 and the export price is $25.50; in Austria the domestic price is $31 and the export price $25.50; in Belgium the domestic price is $30 and the export price $24; in the United States the domestic price is $28 per ton and the export price $26.60. The American railway buys rails from American manufacturers cheaper than the English railway buys rails from the English manufacturers; cheaper than the German railway buys from the German manufacturer; cheaper than the French railway buys from the French manufacturer; cheaper than the Austrian railway buys from the Austrian manufacturer, and cheaper than the Belgian railway buys from the Belgian manufacturer. [Applause.]

No manufacturer can calculate with exactness what quantity he can sell in a year or how much he ought to or can produce. The market may be strong or it may be weak. The accumulation of a stock of steel rails is neither practicable nor the exercise of good business judgment, and it is far better that our mills be kept busy on full time, paying the breadwinner of the family good wages and giving him steady employment, than to put out the fires, disorganize and disrupt the force, and deprive the wage-earner of his wage. An export discount of 5 per cent on 10 per cent of the production! What does it amount to? It does not cripple our railroads. They are not complaining. It does not influence freight rates. Ours are now the lowest in the world. Simply a small surplus is sold abroad. The home market, the home industry, and the home wage-earner are maintained. Besides, if there is a demand for the entire output for home consumption at $28 per ton, is any sensible being justified in presuming that the home market will not be first supplied? Would any business man sell for $26.40 that which he can get $28 for?

In iron and steel structural material the difference between the domestic and export price is in about the same proportion as that given for the countries I have just named for steel rails. But this question of export discounts has become what the lawyers call res judicata. It was submitted to the American people in 1900, again in 1902 and in 1904 and in 1906. The verdict was that there was nothing in it. Senator GALLINGER has pointed out that out of every three thousand dollar's worth of manufactures produced in this country one dollar's worth is sold abroad at a discount under the domestic price, and logically concludes it is better to do this and keep our industries busy on full time and our wage-earners in steady employment at good wages rather than to put out the fires, still the hum of industry, and deprive our people of work. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TIRRELL. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if in the course of his investigations he has not also discovered that after our foreign trade is fairly established abroad in any particular country that many of the industries to which he has referred are not receiving higher prices for their products than they are receiving here? In other words, if the foreign trade is not really better than the domestic trade in many of those industries that have been firmly established abroad by our manufacturers?

Mr. BANNON. That is undoubtedly true.

Another important industry in Ohio is the manufacture of fire brick and ground fire clay. That industry is dependent upon the condition of the iron and steel industry, because fire brick and fire clay are an important factor in the construction and repair of mills and furnaces. When the furnaces and mills are busy so are the fire-brick yards, and when iron and steel bring good prices so do the products of these yards. If the steel worker has steady employment at good wages, so does the fire-brick maker, and the protective tariff on iron and steel not only protects the former, but the latter as well. The friends of protection can and will give these intimately related industries fair treatment, and the enemies of protection will not. In November those engaged in the iron industry and in the fire-brick industry, in Ohio at least, will have the opportunity of saying whether they desire the tariff revised by its Republican friends or its Democratic enemies, and the result will be the same that Ohio has registered in every Presidential campaign for more than forty years. [Applause.]

One of the important Ohio agricultural productions is wool. For years the cry of free wool was heralded by Democracy all over this country. What a panorama they spread before us! Cheaper clothes for the farmer, the wage-earner, and for everybody. New woolen mills springing up everywhere, giving steady employment to countless thousands and dividends to the capital invested. Finally, in 1894, the Democratic party gave us a tariff law by the terms of which our manufacturers got free wool. And then the farmers of Ohio and Texas and California and New Mexico and Michigan and of the Northwest, the employees of the woolen mills of the North and East, and those having their money invested in these mills were duly impressed with the great prosperity which was to come to them from free wool, but which, however, failed to arrive. Many woolen mills were closed. Everybody wore their old clothes. They had no money with which to buy new ones. The employees of these mills were either out of work or employed on half time at reduced wages. The dividend check remained in the check book. With free raw material for the factory the factory was idle. The figures tell the story. In 1896 with free wool the farmer received from seventeen to eighteen cents per pound for the wool sheared from his flocks. In 1906, under a Republican protective tariff, he received from thirty-four to thirty-five cents per pound. That is the difference between protection and free trade to the farmer. Let us see how the factory is affected.

In 1896 we imported, under a Democratic tariff, woolen manufactures to the value of $53,000,000, but in 1906, under a Republican tariff, we imported woolen manufactures to the value of $23,000,000. In other words, under the Democratic plan wages necessary to produce $53,000,000 worth of woolen goods were paid to foreign workmen in foreign mills, while under the Republican plan wages on less than half of that importation were paid abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.] Under the Democratic system the wages were paid to the foreigner; under the Republican to the American. [Applause.] In 1896 we exported $913,000 worth of woolen manufactures, but in 1906 we exported more than $2,000,000 worth of this commodity. To state it another way. Under the Republican plan we paid American wages to American workmen upon more than twice as much woolen manufactures exported than we did under the Democratic plan. Under their scheme the farmer gets almost nothing for his wool; the wage-earner next to nothing for his labor, and the mill owner nothing at all for his investment. And these facts will be before the Ohio farmer when he goes to the polls in November. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Let us next consider another Ohio industry—the manufacture of boots and shoes. Ohio ranked fourth of the States of the Union in that industry in 1900 and third in 1905. During the latter year we manufactured more than $25,000,000 worth of boots and shoes, and paid to 13,890 wage-earners engaged in their manufacture almost five and one-quarter millions of dollars. Now, let us see how Democratic tariff revision would affect that industry. In the Fifty-ninth Congress the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said that if the Republican side would agree to remove the tariff on boots, shoes, and leather, coupled with a proposition for free hides, he would support it so quick it would make our heads swim, and such a measure would be passed by the House. The removal of the tariff on boots and shoes would bring the Ohio shoemaker in direct competition with the European shoemaker. The general average paid shoe lasters in Ohio in 1906 was $19.14 per week. In England it was about $7.50 per week. The wages paid the other operatives are in the same proportion. The cost of production in all foreign countries is less than ours—in Belgium the shoe workmen receiving from 84 cents to $1.08 for twelve hours' work. A special agent from the Department of Commerce and Labor, after an exhaustive examination abroad, reported last year that "the American shoemaker is the best fed, the best paid, and the most skilled in the world." Democratic tariff revision of this schedule would bring those operatives down to the level of their competitors in foreign lands and destroy the rank now held by them in the world. It would do more. It would deprive the Ohio farmer of the tariff levied for his protection upon the hides of the tens of thousands of cattle raised by him. Verily, like the darky's coon trap, Democratic revision would catch them "a comin' and a gwine." I don't believe the Ohio farmer or the Ohio shoemaker will vote for Democratic revision next November.

I will not pursue this argument farther. If the national platform of the Republican party this year declares for tariff revision, then the voters of Ohio and of every State in the Union must say whether they desire revision by the friends of protection or by those who believe protection is a robbery; by a Republican Administration or by a Democratic Administration; by the party of William J. Bryan or by the party of Theodore Roosevelt. And when these same voters recall the longest four years in our history, those good old Democratic times from 1893 to 1897, when want and despair filled the land, it will not take them long to make up their minds. Republican principles bring better prices and better markets to the American farmer, the American merchant, and the American manufacturer; better wages and better homes and happier families to the American wage-earners; more commerce to the American railways and vessels; increased activity in the building trades and real estate and a better line of credits and accounts to the banker.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] in a speech in this House the other day, said the negroes in Ohio would vote the Democratic ticket next November and that Ohio would go Democratic. He fails to give the Ohio negro credit for any intelligence. Ohio negroes know what Democratic hard times are just as well as the white people do. They don't want a Democratic Administration any more than we do. They are no better prepared for it than we are, and they would suffer from it just as much if not more than we would. The gentleman from Illinois also asked what would become of the Republican party without the negro vote. I ask him what would become of the Democratic party if the negro were allowed everywhere in America to exercise his constitutional right to vote? [Applause on the Republican side.] I will tell you what would become of the Democratic party. The Socialists, Populists, or Prohibitionists would cast more votes than it would. [Laughter.]

I want to say something about the old soldiers of Ohio. That State furnished in the civil war of her citizens 340,000 men, or more than one-half of her adult male population and one-eighth of the Union Army. They fought on every great battlefield of the war and were always conspicuous for their bravery. Listen to the list of Ohio's generals: Grant, Sherman, McPherson, Sheridan, Noyes, Crook, Hayes, McClellan, Rosecrans, Custer, and those gallant old warriors who have survived them all and are now Representatives in Congress from the State of Ohio, SHERWOOD and KEIFER. [Applause.] Those brave soldiers, the fighting McCooks, were all from Ohio. The nation is liberal with the veterans of her wars, and is now protecting by generous pension laws those who preserved and protected the Union.

Ohio is proud of her sons in every walk of life. In this Congress, among the many who are Ohio born, I would mention Senators ALLISON, BEVERIDGE, CARTER, ELKINS, and SCOTT, and Representatives HULL, HEPBURN, CALDERHEAD, of Kansas, GARDNER, of Michigan, BEDE, NORRIS, of Nebraska, and STURGISS. Two members of the President's Cabinet are Ohioans. Seven of the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States have been from Ohio. Thomas A. Edison, whose great inventive genius has revolutionized the industrial and business world; Doctor Hall, whose contributions to arctic exploration is a part of the world's history, and George Kennan, who gave this country its first knowledge of Siberia, are Ohioans. William D. Howells and Albion W. Tourgée are from Ohio. So are Petroleum V. Nasby and Artemus Ward.

Alice and Phœbe Cary were Ohio women, and the poem entitled "Nearer Home," written by Phœbe Cary, has found a place in almost every book of hymns. To those of this House on the minority side of this Chamber who represent districts whose people study the question of protection to American industries and appreciate the great work the Republican party has done for the benefit of the entire nation I would commend for their earnest consideration the first verse of that poem:

> One sweetly solemn thought
> Comes to me o'er and o'er—
> I'm nearer home to-day
> Than I ever have been before.

[Laughter and applause.]

Twenty-four Cabinet officers were natives of Ohio. Whitelaw Reid is an Ohioan; Thomas Ewing, Thomas Corwin, Benjamin F. Wade, Joshua R. Giddings, and Salmon P. Chase were from Ohio. So was Allen G. Thurman, the noblest Roman of them all. That eminent statesman of our time, John Sherman, was an Ohioan. Two Vice-Presidents were from Ohio—Hendricks and Fairbanks—and Ohio has furnished a list of Presidents of whom that State and the country is proud: William Henry Harrison, Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Benjamin Harrison, and William McKinley. [Applause.] What a list of great Americans! The candidates for the next presidency have not yet been selected by the two great political parties. One county in Ohio offers three [laughter], one to the Democratic party and two to the Republican. The Democratic standard bearer will not come from Ohio. He will come from Nebraska. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They will go farther and fare worse. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is not for me in this House to predict the nominee of the Republican party. But whether he come from Indiana or Illinois, from Wisconsin or Pennsylvania, from New York or Ohio, there is one thing certain, and that is that Ohio will remain true to her traditions, true to her citizenship, true to her people, and true to the principles of the grand old Republican party, and will cast her electoral vote for the Republican nominee. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman from Ohio, before he takes his seat, permit me to ask him a question or two with reference to his remarks upon the iron and steel schedules? I understood him to justify the existing tariff on iron and steel products on the price of the raw material and the price of labor. Was I correct?

Mr. BANNON. No; you were not.

Mr. BOWERS. Did the gentleman say anything in his remarks with reference to the cost of the labor used in manufacturing these iron and steel products and the cost of the material?

Mr. BANNON. He did.

Mr. BOWERS. Did not the gentleman then base a justification for these schedules, to some extent, upon the cost of material and the cost of labor?

Mr. BANNON. Not entirely so.

Mr. BOWERS. Then upon what did the gentleman base it?

Mr. BANNON. I can not go back at this time and repeat my argument on that; but suffice it to say I showed that the price of material used in the manufacture of iron and steel had increased and that the wages paid to the men engaged in those industries had increased, and that consequently the price of iron and steel must necessarily increase.

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman advise me, then, how he reconciles his remarks with this statement I take from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 24, 1906, as appearing in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]:

> Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask a question, not so much as to where we sell our goods, but how we make our goods? Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania name me any steel mill in the world that can make steel rails cheaper than they are made at Pittsburg? Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania name me any iron furnace in the world that can make pig iron cheaper than at Birmingham?
> Mr. DALZELL. I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BOWERS. I willingly yield him two minutes to answer me.

Mr. BANNON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania explained that fully. I showed, and it is not necessary to repeat my remarks on the question of steel rails, that the American railway company buys its rails from American manufacturers cheaper than does the English railway company or any other foreign railway company from the steel-rail manufacturers of such countries. Pittsburg and Birmingham are not the only places in America where iron and steel are manufactured, but the cost of production there is much less than it is in other localities. In my district it costs more to manufacture iron and steel than in Pittsburg or Birmingham, and those industries must be protected.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Can the gentleman from Ohio name any place in the world where the workingman, in an iron or steel plant, is paid as much as he is in Pittsburg and elsewhere in this country?

Mr. BANNON. Certainly not.

Mr. BOWERS. Or any other country where they do as much work per man.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is true also, thank God.

Mr. BOWERS. I yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, the Republican party has been in control of every department of this Government since the 4th day of March, 1897. In the legislative department you have had a large, safe working majority; in the Senate an overwhelming majority, and in this House your majority has ranged from 25 to 114. The executive department has, for most of this time, been unanimously Republican; but I think that your majority at the White House to-day is smaller than it ever has been, for there are some evident signs of Democracy visible there once in a while now.

In other words, there never has been a time since the 4th of March, 1897, when you could not have passed any law which you wanted passed, or repealed any existing law you might have desired to repeal. Your power in the nation has been full and complete, and with that power came the responsibility for the welfare, the happiness, and prosperity of the people of this nation. How well have you met that responsibility? Your first act on coming into power in 1897 was to pass the Dingley bill, the highest protective tariff law this country has ever seen, a law directly in the interest of the few and against the interests of the masses, a law which does not tax a man upon that which he possesses, but does tax him upon that which he does not possess but is compelled to have. In other words, you laid your hand heavily upon the man who toils and strives to produce the wealth of this nation, and then by taxing his necessities transferred the result of his labor into the pockets of the few, who are the beneficiaries under this law, and whose chief characteristics are to contribute liberally to Republican campaign funds to be used biennially by you to keep yourselves in power in this nation.

The few years prior to 1897 were dry years for the farmers. Crop failures were the rule; but in the year 1897 and succeeding years a kind Providence has smiled upon the farmers of this country in an abundance almost beyond comprehension, as evidenced by the fact that the surplus products of the farms have paid our indebtedness to foreign nations and turned the balance of trade in our favor to the extent of millions of dollars. And yet you were impious and arrogant enough to ignore the beneficence of a kind Providence, who sent the sunshine and showers, and tempered the seasons so as to make the corn and wheat and cotton to grow, blossom, and ripen in an abundance scarcely dreamed of, but you claimed the credit for all this was due to a Republican Administration. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] How often have you presumed upon the intelligence of the American people and played upon the prejudice of the devotees of your party by claiming that the credit for all that is good, either upon the land or in the seas, was due to a Republican Administration? How often have we been compelled to sit here and listen to your denunciation of the Cleveland Administration, the drawing of grewsome pictures of soup houses, bread riots, Coxey's army, and so forth, and then to hear you say that such things can not and will never occur under the "splendid and magnificent rule of the Republican party?" But how is it to-day?

Mr. PADGETT. Will it disturb the gentleman if I interrupt him?

Mr. HAMLIN. Not at all. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. PADGETT. I have here a clipping taken from the Washington Post a day or two since, which I will read:

19,200 FREIGHT CARS IDLE—B. & O. PROPERTY VALUED AT $19,200,000 NOT EARNING REVENUE.

[Special to the Washington Post.]

BALTIMORE, MD., March 10.

The Baltimore and Ohio has issued the following statement:

"Because of general business depression, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has 19,200 idle freight cars standing on yard and side tracks and in shops over the system, which includes the Baltimore and Ohio Southwestern Railroad, out of 87,500 cars. Never before in the history of the Baltimore and Ohio, the pioneer railroad of the country, was there near so many cars out of service at one time. At a valuation of $1,000 per car, this represents $19,200,000 of the company's money that is not earning any revenue."

The gentleman will notice that it says this is the first time in the history of the country when there were so many outstanding cars, etc.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is true.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to another statement. It is this:

PHILADELPHIA, March 10.

Several thousand unemployed men in this city will receive employment on public works, in all probability, in about a month, by the passage of the $10,000,000 loan. Councils will authorize the floating of the loan at the next meeting, and Mayor Reyburn will immediately advertise for bids.

Does not that beat soup houses? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMLIN. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee for interrupting me, and further on I shall present other statements along the same line.

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will for a question.

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman who has the floor, in view of the comments that have been made, indicate to the committee how many of the 19,200 freight cars were built during a Democratic Administration?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am going to discuss that feature of it a little later, if the gentleman will give me the opportunity. However, there is one thing certain, they are not being used under this Republican Administration.

Mr. BURKE. And will the gentleman also, during the course of his remarks, indicate where it has been claimed by the Republican party that these hard times would never occur under Republican Administration?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will endeavor to answer the gentleman.

Mr. PADGETT. At the present time they are occurring under Republican Administration.

Mr. BURKE. That is the difference between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. HAMLIN. I shall show by remarks made by certain Republican Members in this House that the language used by me is quoted correctly; that these panics would not occur under Republican Administration. I will also show that every panic that has visited this country within the last fifty years has occurred under Republican Administrations or as a result of Republican Administrations.

You have been in undisturbed rule in this country for the last ten years. What do you say now? What is the matter with the country? What is the sign we see over the doors in New York, in Philadelphia, in Toledo, in Buffalo, in St. Louis, and other large cities? We see at a glance that they are soup houses. Are they Cleveland soup houses? No; they are Republican soup houses. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

On the bank doors lately have been "Closed," and not "Opened." Coxey's army is mobilizing again, preparing to march on to Washington. Thousands of workingmen out of employment, tramping and begging for work. Are you going to be fair enough to take the responsibility of this condition upon yourselves; or are you going to charge this calamity up to Providence or the Democratic party, as you usually do?

Providence has certainly done His part, because there are millions of dollars of surplus farm products waiting to-day to go to market, and yet in the midst of this plenty we have one of the greatest industrial panics the country has ever seen. You have never missed an opportunity, either in this House or on the hustings, to boast that the prosperity through which we have passed was due entirely to the fact that the Republican party is in power. You have said these calamities could not come while you were in power.

The following extract from a speech delivered in this House during the Fifty-eighth Congress by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] will serve as a sample of your vain boastings. Let me read:

Eight years ago the Republican party marshaled its host in the shadows of industrial depression, in the shadows of closed factories and suspended banks.

And you, Mr. Chairman, have led us back into "the shadows of closed factories and suspended banks."

He says:

We were running in debt then at every tick of the clock, accumulating an overdraft in our Treasury.

How history repeats itself. Only a few weeks ago the eminent chairman of the Appropriation Committee vouchsafed the comforting (?) information that we were now facing a $100,000,000 deficit.

But let us go on. He said—

Fed by selling bonds.

Yes; your mighty hosts have made a complete circle, and you are back in the shadows whence you started, for you have within the last few months sold bonds, not to replenish a depleted Treasury, but infinitely worse, to bolster up rotten finance in Wall street. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me proceed—and drained by an endless chain, recruiting Coxey's army and reading Coin's Financial School.

Mr. Chairman, how natural everything looks. Yes, Coxey's army is recruiting again, and we are reading, not Coin's Financial School, but ALDRICH'S and FOWLER'S financial school. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Referring to the years prior to 1897, he says:

The years were lean and the earth was bare.

True, but these ten years in which your "marshaled hosts" have been leading us, the years have been fat and the earth laden with fruitage, and yet you moved in a circle, and we are again in the shadows under your leadership. Again he says:

Then no man trusted his neighbor if he could help it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, no city banker trusts another banker if he can help it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He says:

A man with a dollar ahead would not loan his neighbor on first mortgage because, first, he was afraid of being called a plutocrat; and, second, because he was afraid his neighbor would pay him in depreciated money.

Mr. Chairman, no man ever heard of another being paid in depreciated money in the panic of 1893, but everybody has been paid, not in money at all, but in clearing-house certificates and other disgraceful and disreputable makeshifts in this Republican panic of 1907. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, will my friend permit me to give him a name for that kind of currency?

Mr. HAMLIN. With pleasure. What is it?

Mr. BOWERS. Christian Science money. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMLIN. Just think you have not got the money and you have not got it. Is that the idea?

Mr. BOWERS. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I accept the suggestion. Let us listen to the eloquent gentleman again. He says:

Out of the ruins of that time we have builded a shining edifice of prosperity and scattered laughter with a spendthrift hand, and yet nothing has happened; nothing but a Republican Administration.

God save the mark.

Mr. Chairman, may I not paraphrase the gentleman's last statement by saying that the prosperity through which we have passed these last few years, which was due entirely to the industry and frugality of our intelligent and energetic people, supplemented by a beneficent Providence who "scattered blessing with a spendthrift hand" until we have "builded a shining edifice," inhabited by a prosperous and happy people, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans, and from the Canadas to the magnolia groves of the beautiful Southland, and yet in the midst of this prosperity, without apparent reason or excuse, there came suddenly upon us a terrific panic, which has shaken the industrial world from center to circumference, turned homes of laughter into homes of tears, and hearts of hopes into hearts of despair, driven fathers from loved ones and sent them forth by the score and thousands, tramping over the country begging for work, and yet "nothing has happened; nothing but a Republican Administration?" [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It might be well to remind the gentleman of the old proverb, "Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Then, as a grand climax to his extravagant boasting, he says:

Now, from the offices of the stockjobber to the heights of political economy, it is everywhere apparent that we are prosperous.

Mr. Chairman, that the stockjobber has been prosperous is to the everlasting disgrace of the party in power [applause on the Democratic side], and as to the "heights of political economy," to which the gentleman referred, I can only imagine that he had reference to such conduct as that practiced by Mr. Cortelyou when as chairman of the National Republican committee he gathered in the thousands of dollars from the great insurance companies and trusts of the country as a campaign fund with which to carry the election of 1904. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Or he may have referred to that same gentleman's conduct in refusing to return to its rightful owners any of this ill-gotten money. This same Republican party, which has been so eloquently eulogized by my friend from Michigan, is still in power, but let us see if this prosperity "abideth with us still." Let me read:

HUNGRY CHILDREN IN RIOT SMASH PLATE-GLASS WINDOWS OF RESTAURANT TO GET DINNERS.

[Special to Washington Post.]

NEW YORK, February 18.

Fifteen hundred hungry school children, attracted by the prospect of a free hot dinner, were in a riot to-day in front of a restaurant at 272 Grand street, and before the police could restore order by assuring the little ones that all would be fed the plate-glass window was pushed in.

BREAD RIOT IN BUFFALO—GENEROUS GROCER DID NOT HAND OUT LOAVES FAST ENOUGH.

BUFFALO, N. Y., February 1.

The police force at West Seneca has been trebled to cope with the possibilities of an outbreak of lawlessness among the hundred idle and hungry foreigners formerly employed in the steel mills. A bread riot occurred last night.

[From Springfield (Mo.) Republican.]

LARGE NUMBER FED.

Calls for aid at soup houses are increasing every day. More than three hundred people were fed yesterday at the soup house being conducted by charitable organizations of the city. Though the place was open to the public only last Saturday, hundreds have applied for something to eat.

ROAD EMPLOYEES LEFT OUT—1,000 WERE AFFECTED BY RETRENCHMENT OF LAKE SHORE RAILROAD.

ELKHART, IND., January 29.

The Lake Shore Railway's big locomotive and allied shops, which had already been reduced to a four-day work, were put on a two-day work to-day. One thousand men are affected.

Many more such conditions could be portrayed, but I think it will be sufficient for me to read only one or two more. I here have a statement by Ex-Secretary of the Treasury Lyman P. Gage, a prominent Republican, recently made before the Committee on Banking and Currency in this House. He says:

In 1907 we were on the deep waters of prosperity, when everything ought to have floated serenely, but we bumped hard. We stove open the bottom of the ship. We met with first-class disaster.

Now, just one other little extract from a speech recently made by the Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, another late Republican Secretary of the Treasury and at present an aspiring candidate for the Republican nomination for President:

Over 300,000 freight cars standing empty on the tracks, 30,000 locomotives white leaded and out of commission, one-fourth of the population of several large cities idle, and for the first time under Republican Administration free soup houses in every industrial center; the price of farm produce naturally and materially depreciated, furnish an object lesson which ought to produce a measure of sober-mindedness on the part of the American people.

My friends, it would have saved you much humiliation if you had taken heed to the injunction contained in verse 12 chapter 10, First Corinthians, "Therefore let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I am by no means gloating over the adversity which has come upon the Republican party or the calamity which has befallen the country by reason of your mismanagement. God forbid! But I only want to remind you who have regaled us so often over the panic of 1893, which you unjustly charge to us, that the chickens have simply come home to roost. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You are in a position to do much to correct this lamentable condition if you will. The President has earnestly recommended many remedial measures and asked you to take action. You have a majority of more than fifty in this House and an overwhelming majority in the Senate, and I am certain that I can assure you, if you will bring in any reasonable measure to relieve this distressed condition that there will not only be no opposition on this side of the Chamber, but we will vote for the measure as we did for the rate bill, and you will find us ready to help you to pass any of the kind of measures which will relieve the condition existing in the country to-day.

Why do you not bring in a bill here to provide for the guaranty of bank deposits, and in States where they have not already provided for the guaranty of these deposits let the State banks, if they desire to do so, come in under Federal supervision and be guaranteed the same as national banks, placing them on an equal footing with national banks, so that there can be no advantages had, and then, under the provisions of many bills pending in this House, this guaranty could be made on the part of the Government and yet it not stand to lose a cent, but when depositors all over the country place their money in the banks they will have the assurance that they can get it out again and not be compelled to take clearing-house certificates, or perhaps nothing at all? [Applause on Democratic side.] Do this and money will come out of hiding and confidence will be restored, soup houses will be closed, factories may be opened, and the country experience another degree of prosperity.

The President asks you to pass an employers' liability law. We ask you to do it. You claim to be the friends of the laboring men—that is, you make that claim during every campaign—and now you could pass that law unanimously if you can get the men upon your side of the Chamber to vote for it.

Why do you not pass a law limiting Federal courts in the granting of injunctions and providing for trials by jury in contempt cases?

You boast that the Treasury vaults to-day are bursting with money. If so, why do you not pass a law appropriating some of this money to aid the farmers in the building of good roads, the improvement of our inland waterways, and the erection of public buildings, and making other internal improvements, and thereby give idle men employment?

If you are not bound hand and foot to Wall street and allied interests, why do you not pass a law providing for the publication of campaign contributions so as to prohibit the raising of large campaign funds with which to debauch the voters of the country?

I introduced a bill here to amend section 2 of the act of June 27, 1890, in relation to pensions, which provides that every man serving in a State militia organization for ninety days or more under the command of a regular commissioned officer of the United States Army, may be placed upon the same footing with the man who happened to be formally mustered into the service. Now, if it is right to grant pensions at all, undoubtedly this is a just measure. These men served right alongside of those who were formally mustered into the service, were exposed to as much danger, many of them served not only ninety days, but two or three years, they are now old and broken down in health, and yet you turn them out to die unpensioned, "unwept and unsung." Why do you not pass that bill? You could pass it to-day if you desired to do so.

I also introduced a bill to emancipate the postal employees of this Government. As it is now the Post-Office Department presumes to prescribe to the rural carriers, I understand, what manner of dress they shall wear when on duty, and under the rulings of this same Department a postal employee, when in the august presence of a Member of Congress or other Government official, must stand dumb; "as a sheep before her shearer," he "openeth not his mouth." No matter if he feels that he is being treated unfairly he must not mention his grievance to his Congressman, and if he should be bold enough to do so it will be at the risk of his position. In other words, when he enters the postal service under this free Government he leaves behind much of his American citizenship. Mr. Chairman, at the rate that the Post-Office Department has been regulating, it will not be long until it will be prescribing what the employees shall eat, when they shall retire at night, when they shall rise in the morning, and so forth.

To all of this "pollycoddle" I am opposed. Let us return to this army of loyal workers their full rights as American citizens.

Why will you not pass this bill?

There are many other good measures which you could pass between this and the latter part of next week, and we stand ready to help you. Why do you not do it? You have the power, and yours is the responsibility.

Is your refusal to pass these bills due to the fact that your party is owned body and soul by predatory wealth? Are you afraid to legislate in the interests of the people for fear you will antagonize some special interest? That you will not pass these bills which I have mentioned I am absolutely certain. Your policy is to do as near nothing as possible, adjourn and go home, and then tell the people how you have agonized for them, and how hard you will work if they will only send you back. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. BURKE. The gentleman indicates, among other bills that ought to be passed, one providing for the publication of campaign contributions. I take it from the character of the gentleman's remarks that he is a lawyer, and I want some information. I would like to have the gentleman indicate just what kind of a bill this House or the Congress of the United States could pass that would be effective.

Mr. HAMLIN. There are two or three bills pending before the Committee on the Election of President and Vice-President to which I most cordially refer the gentleman, and I think that he could get the information that he desires by reading those bills. My time will not permit me to go into a detailed discussion of how a bill should be drawn or exactly how it should be worded in order to bring about that result.

Mr. BURKE. Will the gentleman permit this question?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. In view of the fact that he himself has indicated inability during the time allotted to him to outline a particular measure, and in view of the fact that Col. William J. Bryan, when before that committee, was also unable to outline an effective measure, by what right does the Democratic party saddle upon the majority of this House the burden of passing a measure which they themselves are unable to outline?

Mr. HAMLIN. I can only answer the gentleman in this way——

Mr. RUCKER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in a few days we will present a bill to you that will accomplish what is desired if you will help us pass it. There will be no question about it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was going on to say that the gentleman's antipathy to the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. William J. Bryan, is such that he doubtless would not be expected to understand him. I read the hearings before that committee, and it seems to me that the plan outlined by Mr. Bryan is so clear and so plain that it would be next to impossible for a man to misunderstand him.

I presume you are proceeding upon the theory that no difference what you do or fail to do here, on election day the rank and file of the Republicans will walk up to the polls and vote the ticket, but in this I believe you will be badly mistaken; that day has passed.

I stated a while ago that your evident policy is to do nothing. That this is true lies in the fact that this Congress met on the 2d day of December and adjourned for the holidays on the 21st, covering a period of eighteen working days, and out of the eighteen days you were actually in session just eleven hours and eight minutes, and nearly one-half of that time was taken up in organizing the House on the first day.

Your conduct on that day reminded me of the New Testament story of Peter and some of the other apostles. When adversity had come upon them in Jerusalem and their Master had been cruelly slain, and they were discouraged, disheartened, and despondent, Peter said: "I go a fishing," and John, James, Andrew, and Nathaniel said: "We go with thee." They thereupon deserted their post, turned their backs upon their plain duty, and hurried back to the Sea of Gallilee to resume their old trade of fishing. I have thought how like this reprehensible conduct was that displayed by you when we met on December 2, and this country in the throes of a terrific panic. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

You were in session only long enough to organize the House by electing its officers and then to transfer to the Speaker all the power possessed by the combined membership of the House, and then Uncle Joe said, "I go fishing," and straightway the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] said, "We go with you," and your manner of going was about this: [Renewed laughter.]

"Uncle Joe" got up, sniffed the fresh air, girded his "fisher's coat" about him, and started for the Mall; closely following him, with much effort to keep the pace, was the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE], and following on his heels was the alert and active gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], armed with a convenient report from the Committee on Rules, with which he had often before caught "suckers." [Laughter and applause on Democratic side.] Hard by in his wake was the bland and genial gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, expressing envy for his wards, who had been free to roam the forest and ply the streams in quest of game, and closely following him was the ever pleasant and always courteous gentleman from Minnesota, the chairman of the great Appropriation Committee, with head bowed and brow knitted trying to figure out some explanation to the people of this country as to how it happened that under ten years of absolute, undisturbed Republican rule we are now facing a hundred-million-dollar deficit, and then followed the main procession of other Members on that side of the House in perfect order, so complete is the discipline over them, and we on this side were compelled to await in amazement your return before any legislation demanded by conditions existing in this country could be taken up and considered. [Renewed laughter and applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, have I drawn the picture too strongly? No. As I said before, of the eighteen working days in the month of December last, you permitted this House to be in session actually, as shown by the official records, just eleven hours and eight minutes, and this country in the throes of a fearful panic, banks closed, factories closed down, soup houses being opened, thousands of honest men with families to support being thrown out of employment, and yet you were deaf to their entreaties. Yours is the responsibility. How well you are meeting it!

The gentleman from New York, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, said in a speech delivered here recently that he had no doubt that the Republican platform adopted at Chicago this summer would declare in favor of revising the tariff, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] more recently gave voice to the same fact, but what did they mean, or is that the usual ante-election statement? True, the gentleman from New York made this declaration in stentorian tones, but I was reminded of the little doggerel I read some time ago:

His voice was the voice of thunder, and his words were words of reproof,
And perhaps he really wondered why we did not stand aloof.
He thought he was being haughty and severe (and he did try),
But we knew he was only bluffing by the twinkle in his eye.

[Great laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, under your administration of affairs for the last ten years there has grown up in this country a system of corruption which appalls the world, and the correctness of this statement seems to have been vouched for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in a speech he delivered in this House the other day, in which he said:

We had the lights turned on the methods of high finance, we had the lights turned on the speculations by the copper syndicate and other syndicates and the immense amount of water in capital stock, and the very moment that these things came into public view the breath of suspicion became manifest and the crisis came.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the very moment that the light was turned on the corruption which has grown up under this Republican Administration the people were appalled and the panic came. And let it never be forgotten that you have only turned the light on a very small spot. If you would only take the lid off and turn the light on in all its effulgency, so that the people might know the real condition which has grown up under ten years of Republican rule in this country, they would with whip in hand rise up next November election day and drive you from this temple. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

It has become a stench in the nostrils of every honest man. It has forced your President to thunder against it as no President has denounced it since Andrew Jackson's time, and yet you are inactive. While predatory wealth was fastening its clutches upon the people, you sat supinely by and called it prosperity, and now that the result of your own neglect and mismanagement comes upon you to plague you, you stand appalled at the result of your own management and refuse to take up the gauge of battle and do service for the people, yet you expect to go out this fall and tell the "dear people" how anxious you are to help them.

Do you think they will believe you for a moment? I tell you they will be by you like the fisherman said of himself, sitting on the bank of the stream under the bridge, when he was accosted by a stranger standing on the bridge with the question: "Are you catching any fish?" "Well, I guess, yes; I caught forty big, fine bass out of this hole yesterday." "Do you know, sir, who I am?" said the man on the bridge. "No; who are you?" "I am the game and fish warden of this district, and by your own confession you have been violating the law." "Well," said the fisherman, "do you know who I am?" "No; who are you?" "I am president of the Roosevelt Ananias Club. I never told the truth in my life. No one ever believes a word I say." [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, you have the opportunity to help the people. If you fail to do it, no one will again believe a word you say.

I am telling you some cold facts, and the rank and file of the people of this country will indorse what I say, that yours is the responsibility and you will be held to account if you do not meet the demands placed upon you. I know you have already begun to speak of the late panic as if it were over, when the truth is thousands of men are now each day being thrown out of employment and others having their wages reduced, and the prices of the farmers' products all rapidly declining.

I have a statement here which was furnished me by a man in a position to know whereof he speaks, and he says, figuring on a basis of wages earned by 268,000 employees on forty-nine railroads west of the Mississippi in 1906, the decrease in wages to employees this year by reason of the panic in laying off men and reduction of hours worked, placed at only 8 per cent, which is a conservative estimate, makes the appalling decrease in wages paid to these employees run up into the millions of dollars per year. Stupendous, and yet, again, see what Mr. Mellin, president of the New Haven Railroad, said:

But the panic has affected business so seriously that we have found it necessary to reduce the service on our system, and since December 15 last 8,000 men have been dismissed and more are being discharged all the time for the same reason.

Now, in that same connection I have another clipping which I will read:

RAILROADS LAY OFF HALF MILLION MEN—AS MANY AS 150,000 OUT OF WORK IN SOUTHERN AND WESTERN STATES.

Officials of the Southwestern and Western railroads say that it would be almost impossible to estimate the number of employees they have laid off in the past sixty days. The forces of the mechanical, accounting, engineering, and clerical departments have been reduced an average of one-third, and it is expected that additional reductions will be made in the next month or so.

The railroads of the United States employ 1,600,000 men, and, according to reports, about 500,000 have been laid off in all branches of the service.

About 150,000 men have been laid off in thirteen Southern and Western States, as follows: Missouri, 15,000; Illinois, 25,000; Kansas, 15,000; Nebraska, 11,000; Arkansas, 5,000; Louisiana, 6,000; Texas, 25,000; Oklahoma, 5,000; Kentucky, 5,500; Tennessee, 7,000; Mississippi, 7,000; Georgia, 13,000, and Alabama, 9,000.

The Missouri Pacific and Iron Mountain System yesterday closed its shops indefinitely. At St. Louis 400 men were left without work; at Sedalia, Mo., 600; at Baring Cross, Ark., 1,200; at De Soto, Mo., 500; at Osawatomie, Kans., 300; at Atchison, Kans., 200, and Fort Scott, Kans., 300.

And yet it was announced, I understand, on the floor of this House, about a week ago, by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY], that the panic actually ended about the 1st day of February last, he presuming to give the exact time, saying that it lasted just three months and one day. I think he would have some difficulty in making these million men who are out of employment to-day believe that he was correct in his statement. At least I have not heard of any bonfires being built by these laboring men to ratify the ending of this terrible industrial panic. It may be that these poor fellows have not heard that the panic is over. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hold a letter in my hand which I shall ask the Clerk to read. It was written to me by a gentleman from my home city, a man I know well, and I know him to be reliable and one of the best men in my city. He is a locomotive engineer, belonging to what I regard as the bravest class of men on earth to-day, men who through either storm or shine, light or darkness, respond to the call of duty, and, standing with hand on throttle and brake, plunge through light or darkness with never a thought of their own safety or welfare, but whose only consideration is for the safety of the human lives on board the train they are pulling. These men not only deserve consideration at our hands, but the eternal and everlasting gratitude of the traveling public. Let us hear what one of these men has to say.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS,
Springfield, Mo., February 1, 1908.

Hon. C. W. HAMLIN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

DEAR SIR: I am requested by your friends, the railroad men of Springfield, Mo., to write you relative to conditions on the Frisco railroad—due to the panic—in hopes that you may introduce or assist in bringing some measure before the present Congress that will relieve conditions and give the wage-earner an opportunity to work so as to earn a living for himself and loved ones dependent on him for support. The Frisco shops only work eight hours per day, four days a week, at present, and were closed twelve working days in January. To-day one-third of the employees of the shops were let out indefinitely; while on the road freight business has fallen off so crews are only making one-half time. This is true of the entire system, and starvation is staring your friends, the railroad men, in the face. The company, owing to short working hours in shops and reduction of number of employees, is unable to keep engines in repair, the result being that when freight is offered for shipment the company is unable to handle it for lack of power. I learn, through our brotherhood, the same conditions prevail on all railroads, and good men are tramping over the country hunting for employment and not able to find any. Is there not some way for Congress to relieve this condition, or is it possible that the monied power is supreme—that the inclosed clipping from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch about J. P. Morgan is true? Must the wage-earner come to starvation in order that dividends can be paid on watered stock and the gamblers and stock speculators grow rich? We, your friends, appeal to you, believing that in this, our hour of need, you can help us out. Awaiting your reply, and trusting that Congress will better conditions,

I remain, yours, respectfully,

M. J. MURPHY,
Chairman Ozark Division 83,
Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers,
849 North Main street, Springfield, Mo.

Mr. WILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WILLETT. I hold in my hand a letter which I received this morning from the New York Independent Council of World Workers. This council has been making an investigation in New York City of the unemployed, and it has just made a report to me which shows the actual labor conditions in New York City to-day. The report is as follows:

NEW YORK, March 13, 1908.

Hon. WM. WILLET, Jr.,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Replying to your request of March 6, 1908, for the New York Independent Council, Independent World Workers, would state that, for your information, I can give you the following few figures that might be of some avail to you in refuting the argument of Congressman BENNET.

The following lists are the result of exhaustive search on the part of men familiar with the method of gathering facts of this character:

ORGANIZED MEN UNEMPLOYED.

	Number.
Building trades (32 represented)	70,000
Clothing and garment workers of all grades	20,000
Tobacco workers, all grades	18,000
Printing and allied trades, engraving, lithographing stereotyping	11,000
Longshoremen	8,000
Machinists, molders, etc	5,000
Railroad men, various branches	4,000
Furniture and piano workers	4,000
Boot and shoe workers, all branches	3,000
Teamsters and clerks	2,000
River and harbor employees	2,000
Diamond workers	500
Total	147,500

I do not include in this list hotel and restaurant workers, as they are but poorly organized, and, on the next page, I give you the unorganized unemployed.

	Number.
Department store employees (warehouseman, factory, laboratory clerks, drivers and other help)	70,000
Hotel and restaurant workers (all branches)	30,000
Office employees (various occupations)	25,000
Mechanics (almost all trades included)	110,000
City employees	10,000
Unorganized railroad workers	8,000
Transportation workers of all grades (clerks, etc.)	38,000
Ungraded laborers of all sorts, about	65,000
Unorganized total	356,000
Organized	147,500
Grand total	503,500

This enormous number exceeds by almost 400,000 the number usually unemployed in and about New York. It may also be taken into consideration that at this time of the year there is a great falling off of the number, but the number this year is steadily increasing. Wages of the employed are going down as a result of this great horde of unemployed, forced into competition for employment.

Should you wish more complete details and the sources from which they come, let me know.

Respectfully, yours, SAMUEL A. STODEL,
Fin. Sec'y N. Y. Ind. Council, I. W. W.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for giving us the benefit of that statement. It occurred to me while he was reading it and showing that there are over one-half million unemployed men in the city of New York alone, that in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNON], who spoke only a moment ago, when he asked the question what would become of the Democratic party if the darkies in this country were all entitled to vote, that I might ask him what will become of the Republican party when this army of 500,000 men refuse to vote the Republican ticket at the next election. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, these appeals touch my heart. You have the votes and we on this side will help you pass any measure to relieve these distressed conditions. Will you do it? I know that when we on this side dare to raise our voices in behalf of the laboring men we subject ourselves to be denounced as demagogues. A few weeks ago my colleague [Mr. SMITH] dared to offer an amendment to the penal code in behalf of the laboring men, and the leader of the majority [Mr. PAYNE] took occasion to denounce his conduct as demagogic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BOWERS. I will yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMLIN. I deny the right of any man to denounce as demagogical the action of any Member to advocate what he believes to be right on the floor of this House. But I say to the gentlemen on that side, if to plead the cause of the farmers and laboring men on this floor is demagogic, then, thank God, such demagogery is as an angel robed in white when compared to that somber bird of hypocrisy which perches upon the Republican banner, as evidenced by your conduct here and upon the hustings. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe it is not only the province of Members on this floor but of every sovereign citizen to criticise that which he believes to be wrong without having his motives impugned. A few years ago, because some people were bold enough to criticise the action of the courts, they were denounced as "dangerous and undesirable citizens," and yet in the last few months we find your President doing the same thing.

I yield to no man in my respect for the judiciary or the Constitution. In our courts I recognize our ultimate safety, but, unfortunately, it is too often the case in these latter years that men have been selected for judicial positions, not because of their extreme learning and preeminent traits of mind, but for their ability theretofore to manipulate political conventions, or, perchance, to have performed some especially shrewd work for the successful candidate on the winning ticket.

In other words, there are on the Federal bench throughout the land to-day many men who were placed there entirely through political "pulls," without regard to their fitness for the position they are to occupy, and after they were securely ensconced in their positions they seemed to think they must do the bidding of the influence which put them there. In other words, instead of becoming a part of the bulwark of our liberties under the Constitution they become the judicial bulwark of the party which put them in power. In many instances I believe the Federal courts of this country have gradually exceeded their authority under the law until I regard their conduct, especially in the indiscriminate use of the injunctive process, as a positive menace to the liberties of our people. I regard the attempt of a Federal district judge to set at naught, at his own sweet will, the action of the people of a sovereign State as extremely portentous and alarming. This Government was created by the States, the Federal courts are creations of the Federal Government, and undoubtedly the creature of the creature can not be greater than the creator. I believe when a State enacts a law for the regulation of its internal affairs any party aggrieved should have recourse to the courts of his State, and if not sustained there he may then appeal, if he desires to do so, to the court of last resort in the nation; but I do not believe that it is the province of any little Federal judge, whose qualifications as a lawyer are not sufficient, perhaps, to permit him to practice successfully in the inferior courts of his county, to ipso facto declare the State enactments unconstitutional, and therefore enjoin a sovereign State from enforcing its own laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, there is much in the President's late message which I indorse, but I candidly believe if the occupant of the White House would quit fighting so many pen battles, and put the machinery of the Department of Justice in motion and invoke the criminal laws now on the statute books and put some of these fellows whom he has denounced so vigorously behind the bars, the country would the sooner recover its equilibrium and corruption would be wiped out. In other words, if we had a little more action and less talk on the part of the White House the country would be very much better off. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I regard it as a shame that the business of this country is to be neglected simply because there is a national campaign impending. The public business is to be sidetracked because your time is consumed in trying to agree on a candidate for President on the Republican ticket. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNON] a while ago said it was not his privilege to name that candidate. I think in that statement he was absolutely correct. Neither do I believe it is in the province of any Republican in this House to name that candidate, because the President will attend to that part of it himself. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] If you fellows will be real good, and behave yourselves and pass some of the legislation which he wants you to pass, he might let you have a small voice in naming the candidate for Vice-President, but not beyond that. [Renewed laughter.]

But I think, Mr. Chairman, it makes little difference whether you name the White House choice, or whether you name the circumstantial governor of New York and consequential candidate for President, or the Speaker of this House, or the presiding officer of the Senate—neither can by any possibility be elected in November. Your party has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. The people will on March 4, 1909, come into their own. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

We on this side are ready to go on with the work before Congress. Our candidate has already been named in the hearts of the American people, and it only awaits the meeting of the convention at Denver in July to publish to the world the name of the next President of these United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

With Bryan in the White House and CHAMP CLARK in the Speaker's chair [applause on the Democratic side], the people will not have to plead in vain for legislation in their behalf. Their demands will be heeded; they will not only have a friend at court, but they will have a friend in the court. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, for six months and more the entire industrial system of our country has been shaken and disturbed by the storm and stress of a great financial panic; values are unsettled, business is paralyzed, confidence is destroyed, industry is dormant, work is scarce, millions of honest toilers are out of employment, and their families suffering for the very necessaries of life. The cause to a great extent, we are told, is our deplorable banking and currency laws. It seems clear to me that at such a time the Congress should exercise extreme care in legislating to correct the evils in order to restore confidence. We should construct and enact legislation with a view to permanently eliminate the admitted mistakes, and at the same time make sure to protect the rights of the people. No slipshod emergency legislation will cure the glaring evils of existing banking and currency laws. Conditions will not improve until our financial policy is changed. Whatever is done in the matter now should be done carefully, deliberately, conservatively, and constructively with a view to permanency. Our banking and currency laws are inadequate, obsolete, and a disgrace to the nation—a veritable crazy quilt of patchwork—but nothing is offered by the Republicans as a safe and lasting remedy to take their place.

We have been in session since the 2d day of last December; we shall adjourn ere the 1st of June; yet nothing has been done, and it seems doubtful if anything of lasting benefit will be done. The Republicans are in control of both branches of Congress; this panic is their panic; they are charged with the responsibility of constructing and passing legislation to remedy existing evils, and if they fail to meet the requirements of the hour they must be held accountable by the people. The so-called "Aldrich emergency currency bill," to allow a few favored national banks to issue $500,000,000 more bank notes, will not remedy the evil, but only accentuate it. The so-called "Aldrich bill" is another little patch on the banking crazy-quilt. It is not merely a makeshift, it is a miserable mistake, and in the end will do more harm than good. Its passage would indefinitely postpone further serious consideration of currency reform. The so-called "Fowler bill," for an asset currency, will not cure the evils. It is so complicated that no one seems to know exactly what it seeks to accomplish, but those who have studied it seem to agree that it would make matters worse instead of better, and ultimately bring about the greatest financial disaster the world has ever known.

The present display of fumbling and ignorance and incompetency on the part of the Republican leaders of Congress in regard to banking and currency reform is a lamentable commentary on their boast of constructive ability and capacity to inaugurate safe and permanent legislation. Suppose the Democrats had put forth a scheme for currency relief which the best banking opinion condemned and declared to be of doubtful legality, would not the Republican orators and newspapers, from one end of the country to the other, ring with denunciations of Democratic incapacity? While the people are starving, however, it is no time for political recrimination, and the thing for us to do now is to get together and prepare a bill for true currency reform of a permanent character and enact it into law. A great financial depression has overtaken us in the halcyon days of the Republican Administration, and we should initiate and pass legislation that will restore business confidence, go far to prevent a recurrence of the disaster, and place our banking and currency systems on a permanent basis.

Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, banking and currency reform are now the most important questions of the hour. We should adopt a governmental currency system that will work automatically and expand and contract with the demands of the country. Congress should act in this matter before we adjourn and place our banking and currency systems on a stable, businesslike, and permanent basis that will prevent in the future monetary panics and financial stringency. Every intelligent man who has studied the subject knows that we have the worst currency and banking laws of any civilized country in the world. Our banking laws are jug handled—against the people and for the national banks. Our currency laws are obsolete and inadequate—the merest kind of patchwork, a regular crazy quilt, a disgrace to our business intelligence, and an indictment against our legislative acumen and political sagacity. They must be changed and reformed along intelligent lines, in the interest of all the people, and based on the well-established principles of the currency and banking laws of all the other great powers, where runs on banks are practically unknown, hoarding of money unprofitable, financial stringency infrequent, and money panics of rare occurrence.

We are, sir, and ought to be, all things considered, the richest and most prosperous nation on earth. During the past summer I traveled over much of the domain of the United States—in the corn lands of the Mississippi, in the mineral lands of the intermountain States, and along the Pacific coast—and I never saw such abundant crops, such wonderful mineral resources, and such overwhelming natural wealth in all my life. It was a revelation to me, as it must be to all other travelers; and if the Congress would enact just laws for all the people, panics would be infrequent, poverty would be scarce, and we would be the happiest and the richest and the most contented people on earth.

Mr. Chairman, the Constitution declares that the right to coin and issue money is a governmental function, and, in my judgment, it should not be delegated to any bank. The national banks should go out of the Government business of issuing money, and the Government should do its own financial business and coin and issue all the people's money like other great countries. The right to coin and issue money is one of the highest attributes of national sovereignty. The Constitution so declares, and I reiterate that the Government should coin and issue all the money, and every dollar should be legal-tender money and worth 100 cents on the dollar here and everywhere. There should be no serious difficulty in framing a bill to meet these requirements to place our banking and currency systems on a stable, conservative, and permanent basis. It is of the highest importance to all the people. There should be no politics in the matter. It is a nonpartisan subject, but the Republicans in Congress apparently can offer no satisfactory remedy for the present evils. They do not respond to the demands of the people and meet the question in a broad and statesmanlike manner. For months they have wrangled over the subject while business languished, banks failed, industry halted, mills closed, and men and women and children starved.

Now, sir, I desire to emphasize the importance of the Republican leaders in Congress immediately taking statesmanlike action in this matter and bring in a bill that will be permanent as a remedy and along constitutional lines. The people want a more elastic currency, at all times responsive to immediate needs, and that will keep pace with the business and the growth of population of the country, meet every crisis, and when the crisis is passed the money should go back to the Government and be canceled, so that at the end of the fiscal year there will be no inflation, but the volume of the currency in circulation, subject to normal conditions, will be about the same, keeping pace, however, with the growth of population and the legitimate needs of our industrial people. In order to accomplish this there should be established, as a part of the Treasury Department, a central bank under the control and supervision of the Government through which all money shall be issued and in which all Government money shall be deposited, and all money issued by the Government through the central bank should be legal-tender money, whether gold, silver, or currency. The law establishing this central bank should provide that the Government shall have the right to issue gold, silver, and currency on time loans to the banks or to the people of the country on depositing with the central bank State or Government bonds to their face value and such other collateral as its officers may deem, in their discretion, ample, such as gilt-edge county and municipal bonds that have not defaulted in the payment of interest in ten years, for such amount of their face value as the central bank, in the discretion of its officers, shall deem safe and ample. All national-bank currency should be called in and canceled as speedily as possible and Government money put in its place. This would gradually retire the national bonds and in a few years wipe out the public debt. The basis of a national-bank currency is a national debt.

If the national-bank currency were called in and canceled by the Government and Government money put in its place, the national debt would soon disappear and the interest on it that the people now pay no longer be a burden to the taxpayers. A law along these lines will meet the demands of the people for a Government central bank and a more elastic currency, and all the money would be Government money—legal-tender money—and sufficient for the business needs of the people at all times. Money panics would no longer be profitable to the few; financial stringency at no time could long exist; the Government could promptly meet every monetary crisis, and the people would always have sufficient constitutional legal-tender money for all legitimate business purposes. In times of emergency the central bank would loan money to the banks and the people of the country on such securities as I have suggested, consisting of Government bonds, State bonds, first-class, gilt-edged county bonds, and municipal bonds of cities having a population of 100,000 or over which have never defaulted in the payment of interest. This class of security, in the nature of collateral for time loans for legitimate purposes, would seem to be safe and ample, but of course it would be at all times discretionary with the officers of the central bank just how much money, if any, to loan on the face or the market value of these hypothecated securities.

All the national banks of the country having business with the Government central bank should be subject to the control and supervision of the central Government bank, and in case a run were made on one bank all the other banks and the central bank should come to its rescue and prevent it from going into the hands of a receiver and the depositors from losing their money.

If a law of this kind were on the statute books, there would be an elastic legal-tender currency in the country to move the crops, meet every monetary crisis, and make it almost impossible for a financial panic, by hoarding money, to occur again. The remedy and the power would be in the control of the Government, and that is where it should be lodged. For instance, if a bank in New Orleans, or a bank in St. Louis, or Chicago, or San Francisco needed money to aid its depositors in marketing the crops, that bank would make application to the Government central bank for a loan for a definite time for the amount it needed, and give ample and safe security, as outlined, for the amount borrowed, and the central bank would then issue to the borrowing bank the money it needed for, say, one, two, or three months, or for such a time as the bank required it, at 2 per cent interest, with the understanding that the borrowing bank should not charge more than 6 per cent interest to those to whom it loaned the money; and, when the emergency was over or the time matured, the securities would be taken up by the borrowing bank and the money loaned returned to the Government central bank and destroyed. If, however, the bank borrowing the money should fail to return the money and take up its collateral within the time stipulated, then the law should provide that the central bank shall have the right to increase the rate of interest so high that it can compel the return of the money loaned. By this means there would be at all times sufficient money in the country to transact the business of the people, keep pace with increasing population, and, at the same time, the Government would be receiving 2 per cent or more interest on its loans, and the national banks could not charge their customers more than 6 per cent interest. The central bank of the Government would make money for all the people, and the other banks would make sufficient to pay their stockholders reasonable dividends, and the farmers, merchants, miners, and business people of the country would be able to get the money they needed at all times for legitimate purposes at reasonable rates of interest. I believe this plan is feasible and practicable and honest and for the best interests of all the people. I know it has the approval of many of our leading economists and thinkers and disinterested financiers.

Mr. Chairman, our country is rich beyond the dreams of the most imaginative. We have ninety millions of population and one hundred and fifty billions of wealth, but we have the worst banking and currency laws ever devised by the human mind. Just think of it! To-day there are more than $200,000,000 of the people's money deposited by the Government in the national banks of the country and not drawing one dollar's interest, and these banks are loaning that money out to the people at from 6 to 20 per cent interest, and now these national banks have the audacity to demand that the Government give them the right to issue $500,000,000 more of national-bank notes. It is all wrong, and Congress must remedy the evil, and should do it before we adjourn. The prophecy of John C. Calhoun seems to have been fulfilled. Years ago he said:

A power has arisen in the Government greater than the people themselves, consisting of many and various and powerful interests combined into one mass and held together by the cohesive power of the vast surplus in the banks.

This mighty combination will be opposed to any change, and it is to be feared that, such is its influence, no measure to which it is opposed can become a law. The time indeed seems fast approaching when no law can pass nor an honor be conferred from the Chief Magistrate—the President—to the humblest worker without the assent of this powerful and interested combination, which is steadily becoming the Government itself to the utter subversion of the authority of the people.

Mr. Chairman, I am now, and always have been, opposed to the Government delegating away its constitutional powers to the national banks. In my judgment they already possess entirely too much power. They are doing precisely to-day, only to a greater extent, what the United States Bank did in the days of Andrew Jackson. The right to coin and issue money is one of the greatest prerogatives of the Republic. It should not be delegated to any national bank or to any monopoly. We should resist the encroachments to-day of national banks on the liberties of the people with the same zeal and the same courage that Jackson resisted the audacious claims of the United States Bank in his day. In Jackson's day there was only one Nick Biddle. To-day there is a Nick Biddle in almost every national bank in the land.

Now, sir, the Republican fallacy that we could not have a panic while the country was under a high protective tariff, a gold standard, and a Republican Administration has been exploded. The people are now looking to the Democratic party to protect them from the selfishness of predatory wealth. The people want monopolies in restraint of trade abolished. They are tired of paying more at home for American-made goods than foreigners abroad pay for the same goods. They want legislation that will prevent future panics by the establishment of a Government central bank of issue, and in which to deposit Government funds, in place of the Republican plan of permitting the national banks to issue more promises to pay money under the name of "asset currency." As Mr. Jacob Schiff, one of the world's great bankers, recently said in an able address before the New York Chamber of Commerce:

I do not wish to pose as a Cassandra, but if our currency conditions are not changed you will have, sooner or later, such a panic that will make all previous panics look like child's play. I do not mean to say that such a panic is imminent, but it will come ultimately unless our inelastic currency is reformed.

Mr. Chairman, a central bank of the United States, such as stands to-day in every other important financial and commercial nation of the world, affords the only sure method by which the surplus funds of the Government can be kept at all times for the use of the people, from whom they have been taken by taxation; while of more far-reaching importance still is the function of such an institution in serving as a bulwark of public confidence, and through the utilization of its power to control, or to largely control, money rates, abate to a large extent the pace of public speculation. Under our present banking system a few national banks, owned by a few men of great wealth, have it in their power to contract the currency at any time and produce a financial panic involving every interest in the country and affecting every workingman in the land. There never was devised by the ingenuity of man a more specious plan for robbing his fellowman than the national banking act. Said Salmon P. Chase, Lincoln's great Secretary of the Treasury, years afterwards, in an hour of regret:

My agency in procuring the passage of the national-bank act was the greatest financial mistake of my life. It has built up a monopoly that affects every interest in the country. It should be repealed. But before this can be accomplished the people will be arrayed on one side and the banks on the other in a contest such as we have never seen in this country.

And that great master of logic, John C. Calhoun, summed it all up when he said:

Place the money power in the hands of a combination of a few individulas and they, by expanding or contracting the currency, may raise or sink prices at pleasure, and by purchasing when at the greatest depression and selling when at the greatest elevation may command the whole property and industry of the community. The banking system concentrates and places this power in the hands of those who control it. Never was an engine invented better calculated to place the destinies of the many in the hands of the few.

We must return to first principles. We must obey the Constitution. We must legislate on this subject and all others for all the people and not for the benefit of the few and the national banks.

Mr. Chairman, now another matter. In connection with the Government central bank there should be established throughout the land postal savings banks, as in other countries. The people of the United States have absolute confidence in the integrity and financial soundness of the Government, and would deposit much of their earnings, now hoarded, in postal savings banks. It would amount to millions and millions of dollars in the aggregate every year. The Government should pay these depositors not more than 4 per cent per annum interest and issue against the deposits postal-deposit certificates, in various denominations, which should be legal tender for all private debts and payable on demand, with interest, at the Government central bank. The Post-Office Department, of course, would deposit this money in the Government central bank. In this way millions and millions of dollars which are now hoarded would come from their hiding places and ultimately be deposited in the Government central bank and by it kept in circulation through the other banks of the country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is all I desire to say on this important subject to-day. However, I indulge the hope that the Republican leaders of the House of Representatives will sidetrack the so-called "Aldrich bill" and the so-called "Fowler bill"—both in the interest of the national banks and against the rights of the people—and give heed to the sure and safe proposition for a Government central bank along the lines I have briefly indicated. The plan can be worked out and perfected, and if I can render any assistance, I shall be glad to do so; and in this connection I ask unanimous consent to print as part of my speech some data relating to the subject-matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

[From the New York Press, February 18, 1908.]

NO ALDRICH BILL, SAY THE BANKERS—NEW YORK STATE MEN ARE UNANIMOUSLY AGAINST IT—WANT ELASTIC CURRENCY—EMERGENCY CIRCULATION, BASED UPON GOOD COMMERCIAL PAPER, IS THEIR DEMAND.

That the membership of the New York State Bankers' Association is opposed to the Aldrich currency bill was made clear last night by the unanimous vote of the council of administration at a meeting held in the Union League Club.

Bankers from every city in the State attended this meeting. Charles Elliot Warren, the president of the State association, delivered an address praising the reforms suggested by Governor Hughes and Clark Williams, State superintendent, and pointing out the defects in the Aldrich measure. Cheers greeted his statement that the best asset of a solvent bank is sound commercial paper, and that a bond-secured currency means an issue that is nonelastic and based upon liabilities. His suggestion for a central bank was approved. Mr. Warren said:

"I believe that if the Aldrich bill becomes a law the best interests of the banks and the citizens of the country will not be protected. Strictly speaking, we do not want a bond-secured emergency currency, for a bond-secured currency amounts to a currency based on liabilities; for, to afford relief, banks who issue this currency must necessarily borrow bonds upon which the issue is based; for, to buy or purchase the necessary bonds out of their resources, banks would have their capacity toward relief of the business community lessened rather than increased by the process; in other words, it would cost, say, $100 for each $75 of currency issued under the conditions of the bill.

"The best method to provide an elastic currency is by the creation of a central bank, under the control of the Government, to perform the functions now imposed upon the United States Treasury and the subtreasuries. It should be the depository of the 5 per cent fund and should be the bank of issue and deposit; in other words, a United States central clearing house, issuing, in lieu of clearing-house certificates, notes on bank assets, heavily taxed, with a necessary reserve fund and ample facilities for quick and prompt redemption. Each clearing house in existence to-day should be a branch or redemption agency of this central bank."

NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION,
New York, March 16, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By direction of this board I hand you herewith a copy of the report of our committee on finance and taxation in relation to the Aldrich bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws, and request that you will present same to the House of Representatives and have it referred to the proper committee.

Yours, very truly,

FRANK S. GARDNER, Secretary.

EMERGENCY CURRENCY—SENATE BILL NO. 3023, ENTITLED "A BILL TO AMEND THE NATIONAL BANKING LAWS," INTRODUCED BY SENATOR ALDRICH—PETITION FROM THE NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION.

NEW YORK BOARD OF TRADE AND TRANSPORTATION,
New York, March 11, 1908.

To the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, the New York Board of Trade and Transportation, urgently, but respectfully, request that Senate bill No. 3023, entitled "A bill to amend the national banking laws," introduced by Senator ALDRICH, be not passed for the reasons set forth in the following report of the board's committee on finance and taxation, which was unanimously adopted at the monthly meeting of the board held this day:

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND TAXATION.

At a meeting of the finance committee, held on Wednesday, the 4th instant, thoughtful consideration was given to United States Senate bill No. 3023, entitled "A bill to amend the national banking laws," introduced by Senator ALDRICH.

This bill provides for an emergency currency to be secured by United States, State, county, municipal, and high-grade railroad bonds, to be issued only in times of emergency. To be specific, the objectionable features of the bill are:

First. Its passage would postpone for an indefinite time further serious consideration of currency reform.

Second. It would add one more unwise provision to our already defective banking system, viz, the inducement it offers to banks to invest in railroad, State, county, and municipal bonds.

Third. Under the provisions of the bill the cost of taking out currency and putting it in circulation would be so heavy that the bill would probably be inoperative.

It is the judgment of your committee that the passage of this bill should be opposed by this association on the general ground that it would bring no benefit whatever to our defective currency system, but, on the contrary, would probably introduce an element of weakness into our banking situation.

Conservative bankers agree that investment in bonds by commercial banks is not in line of good banking, and that no emergency-currency measure should be adopted that would encourage banks to buy bonds for future use or that will make necessary the purchase of bonds in an emergency in order to obtain a currency supply. Everything a bank owes is payable on demand, and its assets at all times should be kept in the most liquid state possible.

The experience of banks in commercial centers, especially in reserve cities, and more especially in New York, is that once or twice each year there arises a condition in the money market which makes it almost impossible for them to maintain their lawful money reserve, and as a necessary precaution conservative bankers in midwinter, when harvest money returns, buy short-time paper maturing in the spring, and in the summer, when money is plentiful, paper maturing in the early autumn. The maturity of this paper enables them to augment their reserves during those seasons of the year when the pressure for money is the greatest, whilst any bond investment, or other form of long-time investment, would make it difficult, if not impossible, at such times for them to easily maintain their lawful money reserve.

If bank assets were kept in such liquid form that at all seasons of the year, without difficulty, banks could maintain their proper reserve, the necessity for an emergency currency would seldom arise.

The provisions of the bill would probably never be availed of except in the direct extremity. For stringency in crop-moving periods they would, in our judgment, be inoperative.

The purchase of bonds with its attendant risk of loss, the tax of 6 per cent, the locking up of probably from 15 to 25 per cent of the cost of the bonds, would make the interest charge on the currency received so high that no banker could be induced to take it out. Even in the face of approaching panic bankers would hesitate to pay so high a rate for money.

The risk of loss involved in the purchase of bonds for emergency purposes would be great, especially if bought during a panic when speculative prices prevail. If a 2 per cent United States bond as security for circulation should be worth from 105 to 110 in time of panic, what would a 4 per cent municipal bond or a 4 or 5 per cent railroad bond be worth for the same purpose? And what would the same bonds be worth after the panic subsides, when the bonds were no longer in demand? Commercial bankers who have in the past invested to any great extent in railroad and municipal bonds will generally agree that the loss on such investments, covering any ten-year period, has been much greater than on commercial paper, and that their bond investments in times of money pressure has made it very difficult for them to accommodate their commercial customers.

The purchase of bonds during an emergency, as security for circulation, would weaken the cash condition of banks unless at the same time they were using clearing-house loan certificates in settlement of balances between themselves, for the money required to purchase the bonds would be one-third greater than the amount of relief obtained, and would have to be paid for in lawful money through the clearing house.

For these reasons your committee recommend that the New York Board of Trade and Transportation enter its protest against the passage by Congress of the bill presented by Senator ALDRICH, and that the Committee on Finance be authorized to take such steps as in its judgment seems wise to oppose the enactment of such law.

Respectfully submitted.

In submitting the report, Mr. Alexander Gilbert, chairman of the committee on finance and taxation, addressed the New York Board of Trade and Transportation as follows:

"Mr. PRESIDENT AND GENTLEMEN: Considering the attendant risk and loss, and the probability that the cost of currency would be at least 8 per cent and the amount of relief received one-third less than the amount required to purchase the bonds, I should hesitate before applying for any relief under the provisions of the Aldrich bill.

"The Aldrich bill provides that certain bonds shall be available as security for the currency to be issued under the bill's provisions. On the approach of a panic it is very probable that speculative dealing in the bonds would advance prices to such a high point that conservative bankers would hesitate to purchase them and take the risk of loss involved, especially if they desired to sell them after the panic should subside and the active demand should no longer exist.

"If we are to have nothing more than provision for emergency currency at the present session of Congress, then let us have a measure that will not be hampered and made impracticable by provisions which require banks to buy bonds in an emergency and take the attendant risk of loss; or to borrow bonds paying 2 per cent for the accommodation, which, added to the tax, will make the currency too expensive to take out; or to carry bonds as a part of their assets, which once or twice each year will make it difficult for them to maintain their reserves and accommodate their customers. Let us have a currency based upon assets already in possession of the banks; that can be put into circulation immediately without the slightest risk of loss; that will afford instantaneous relief, and having done its work can be quickly retired. Clearing-house loan certificates issued to banks on deposit of bank assets approved by the clearing-house committee, with a 25 per cent margin as collateral, and the joint guaranty of the clearing-house banks behind them, constitute the safest and most logical security for an emergency currency that can be offered.

"The business men of the country do not fully appreciate the great value of clearing-house loan certificates in time of panic; neither do the Members of the two Houses of Congress. Nine times during the history of the New York clearing house the associated banks have found it necessary to issue loan certificates. The aggregate amount issued during these nine different periods has been $266,000,000, all of which were retired within a period of four months without the loss of a dollar. Seventy-two per cent of the collateral was commercial paper and only 28 per cent other securities. During the recent panic about $100,000,000 were issued, and before the expiration of the four-months' period the entire amount will have been retired, the amount now outstanding being considerably less than $2,000,000.

"While this may not be pertinent to a discussion of the report of the committee on the Aldrich bill, I introduce it here to call attention to the fact that, since the subsidence of the recent panic, certain Members of Congress in their speeches on financial questions have charged the New York banks with having issued clearing-house certificates for purposes of stimulating stock speculation. Nothing could be further from the truth, as no body of business men in the country have a deeper interest in commercial conditions than the members of the New York Clearing House Association.

"The banks took out loan certificates, paid 6 per cent for the privilege, and loaned to their customers at the same rate. They spent large sums in the purchase of currency and the importation of gold in order to maintain cash payments, which were maintained to a very large extent, notwithstanding reports to the contrary.

"I now refer to these facts to show the country at large that the New York bankers appreciated the responsibility that was resting upon them, and acted promptly, intelligently, and conscientiously.

"If we fail at this time to adopt a currency system that will work automatically, and expand and contract in accordance with the demands of the country, it will be found that the issuance of clearing-house certificates will be the only thing that can be used to save the country when the next acute crisis comes."

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, February 17, 1908.]

WE MUST HAVE CURRENCY LEGISLATION.

Under discussion in the Senate is a measure known as the Aldrich bill. It is a makeshift—nothing more nor less than that. It pretends to be nothing else. Yet there is some merit in it.

The merit lies in the fact that, in the absence of anything like a scientific method of issuing and circulating currency, it provides instant expansion of currency in times of great stress. That is all that it does do. The proposition is simplicity itself. If it had been in operation last fall there could not have been a stringency, because the banks could have supplied themselves with all the notes necessary to conduct business. Clearing-house certificates would have been unknown. Any depositor could have obtained his very last dollar without difficulty.

If this Aldrich bill were intended for all time and to be regarded as a permanent patch upon the crazy quilt which covers our financial legislation, then we should oppose it with might and main. A comprehensive currency system is needed, and badly needed. No makeshift like this Aldrich bill can be accepted in place of a comprehensive system. There is a wide demand for radical reform, and that reform has got to come.

But there is one great obstacle in its pathway—a lack of anything like unity. Bankers are divided among themselves, business organizations hold different views. The Trades League, of this city, for instance, indorses the Fowler idea of a bank asset currency. One expression of thought eliminates the Government entirely from the banking business. Another desires the Government to do everything. As for the Inquirer, it is inclined to agree with Senator LODGE that the proper thing to do is get into touch with the business methods of all the other great nations by adopting the central bank of issue plan.

Out of all these varying views something tangible will eventually emerge, but perhaps not until a commission of experts has made a complete study of conditions. Meanwhile something has got to be done at once to prevent a recurrence of the financial panic of last fall. An elastic currency is the one preventative in sight. That the Aldrich bill provides for. It is a stop gag, if you please, a plug, a dam, anything you may like to call it. If it can be amended and made better, all well and good, but Congress must make up its mind to one thing, which is that a failure to accomplish anything at all because of dissensions will not be condoned by the country.

[From the Philadelphia Item, November 29, 1907.]

OUR FINANCIAL TROUBLE WILL SOON END.

Congressman WILLIAM F. SULZER, of New York, has announced his purpose to introduce a bill in Congress along the lines marked out by the Item, namely, to provide as a part of the Federal Treasury Department a central Government bank, through which all the Government money shall be issued, and in which all deposits shall be made.

Mr. SULZER suggests that the Government charge 2 per cent interest on Government deposits in time of stringency, with the understanding that the banks so borrowing Government money shall not charge more than 6 per cent. In order to force payments of such loans by the Government he would empower the Government to increase the rate of interest to 10 per cent.

Mr. SULZER'S bill, so far as he makes it known, is all right. And if it contains a provision to issue additional legal tenders sufficient to meet normal business requirements and additional sums—not limited—at extra cost perhaps, if necessary, in times of stress, the entire programme will stop any future panics or stringencies before they begin, and put our nation's industries upon a sound and stable footing.

The New York Herald and a number of other prominent journals recently came out editorially advocating what the Item has long maintained, namely, that an issue of legal tenders has become imperative; that what the country wants is more cash, and not more Government bonds.

The Government reiterates that it has increased its circulation of cash from $23 to $33 per capita, round numbers, during the past ten years. But no calculation is made of all the gold that has gone out of this country for steamship freights and by way of emigrants sending and carrying it home during the past forty years, nor of the paper money burned up or destroyed in that time, nor many other ways well known to bankers by which money disappears from public use. So some estimate that to-day we only have from $11 to $16 per capita in circulation. Nobody knows what the sum is. But everybody knows there is not enough to go around to meet the average 7 per cent cash requirements of this nation in excess of the 93 per cent now used in the form of bank checks.

Congressman J. G. CANNON of Illinois, who will be elected Speaker of the coming session of the House of Representatives, says he will assist in currency legislation in the next Congress. He declares himself ready to aid the President in the forthcoming recommendations expected at the opening of Congress next month.

He adds that he will not permit political considerations to interfere with bringing to success the next session of Congress in the matter of legislation that may be needed.

This public word of Speaker CANNON is timely and to a large extent indicates that his following in Congress are to-day fully aroused to the quick necessity of remedial currency action.

Further than that, the recently published utterances, in no slow language, of Representatives and Senators from all over our big-crop districts, demanding instant cooperative Congressional effort for relief from the painful distress of their constituents, also shows the general temper of the next Congress.

An additional strong point for which our business public have good cause for congratulation lies in the fact that this is no partisan question. Democrats, Republicans, and independents are all in accord that something must be done for relief, and done quickly. This feature insures there will be no dilatory tactics employed; and if any obstructing elements are introduced, they will be of a nonpartisan character, which point will better enable our business public to know where to look for their cause.

Speaker CANNON said he was not committed to any plan; that there were very many measures for relief that would be introduced besides those from the Executive chamber and the Committee on Banking and Currency. He added that he is in favor of the passage of all legislation that the country needs, and in favor of doing it as quickly as it can be accomplished.

Continuing, he said: "The country has never been so prosperous as now. There are ten thousand million dollars' worth of products waiting to be marketed. These products are going to market, and there will, in my opinion, be no serious stagnation of business."

There is a vital point right here well worth the careful attention of all industrial and legislative cooperation, namely: If Congress will adhere strictly to the commercial business line in its main intent and purpose, above laid down in the next preceding paragraph, as distinguished from heeding certain opposing interests, who look upon the nation's welfare as entirely secondary to their own, our whole business community will have great cause for rejoicing.

The danger on this point is that "opposing interests," being better informed as to what they do not want, may override Congressmen, who, like Speaker CANNON, practically confess they know comparatively little about currency subjects.

Therefore a simple programme might advantageously be adhered to, such as an unlimited issue of full legal tenders for good security and the making of our Treasury a central bank of issue and deposit.

AN APPEAL TO THE PRESIDENT.

[The following article is an editorial by Hon. Thomas E. Watson, of Thomson, Ga., in his Weekly Jeffersonian, of November 14, 1907, and is worth your time to read and reread and then pass down the line to your neighbors who believe in sound, constitutional money of our fathers.]

Crazy for compound interest on ten times more capital than they had invested in their business, the national bankers built up a huge sky scraper whose foundation is the small end of the pyramid.

On one dollar of real money these greedy gentlemen, who railed against the "50-cent dollar," of constitutional silver money, based a credit currency of 10 to 1.

Crying fiercely for "sound money," they struck down the financial system of a hundred years.

Furiously denouncing the "free-silver cranks," they changed the Constitution of the fathers, without asking the consent of the States, and by a Treasury ruling, followed up by act of Congress, they illegally created a gold reserve, a gold standard, and a credit currency, when the supreme law of the land, as interpreted by the highest court, had established the system of gold, silver, and Treasury notes.

The gold and silver were to be coined on equal terms, and the Treasury notes were to be issued as needed.

Thus the elasticity feature was introduced into the original constitutional system of our fathers.

The precious metals were to be coined as they were dug from the mines and offered at the mints.

Treasury notes were to be issued in emergencies.

This Treasury-note feature gave to the original system all the elasticity that it was safe to give.

Thus Mr. Jefferson issued Treasury notes at the period of the Louisiana purchase.

Mr. Madison issued Treasury notes during the war of 1812.

President Jackson issued them after his overthrow of the national bank.

Mr. Lincoln issued them during the civil war.

But the national bankers dominate the Government, and these modest gentlemen have always bitterly opposed the Treasury notes.

Why?

Because they want their own notes to furnish the elasticity feature of the currency system.

Again why?

Because they want the compound interest on these notes of theirs. Could anything be more evident?

Out of sordid and grasping selfishness, therefore, the national banks set in to destroy the Treasury notes issued under Mr. Lincoln, and they caused to be burned up nearly two thousand million dollars of national notes before President Grant put his foot down and made them stop it.

In the place of the millions of destroyed Treasury notes the national banks at once slipped credit currency of various sorts.

Upon this they have earned enormously in compound interest.

They hate the Treasury notes that they have been persistently endeavoring to drive Congress into ordering the destruction of the remaining $346,000,000 of greenbacks which General Grant saved.

At the present time these sound-money gentlemen, who have brought the country to the brink of ruin, are clamoring for an "elastic currency," but they demand a monopoly of the rubber.

They must be permitted to furnish the elastics.

They must have the compound interest.

They must be invested with the tremendous power of expansion and contraction.

They must be left in such full control of the financial situation that every succeeding President must be made to feel that the New York banks hold the Government in their power, just as President Cleveland felt it:

"My God, Oates, the banks have got the Government by the leg!"

Think of a President putting up a poor mouth like that!

Humiliating to the last degree is a situation in which our Chief Executive trembles before the banks.

Recreant to his trust is the President who fails to use the powers invested in him by the Constitution to save his people in just such a crisis.

Away with the illegal, contemptible makeshift of clearing-house certificates.

They add insult to injury.

There is no law for them.

They are an outrage upon innocent millions of people whose money has been unlawfully used by high-finance criminals.

Give us the relief which the Constitution of the United States provides.

GIVE US TREASURY NOTES.

The Supreme Court declared that they came within the true intent and meaning of the Constitution. That decision has never been overruled. Therefore it is law.

You are not afraid of the New York bankers, are you, Mr. Roosevelt?

You will not echo the cowardly whine of Grover Cleveland, will you, Mr. Roosevelt?

A lusty young fellow, who persistently kept out of the war by hiring a substitute, as the robust, unmarried Grover Cleveland did, was not expected to have courage of the real sort, but you went where the bullets sang, Mr. Roosevelt.

You didn't dread the smell of powder.

You proved that you had grit.

Therefore you are not afraid of the "malefactors of great wealth," who have rioted in reckless methods.

You will face them, as Andrew Jackson did.

You will drive the national banks off the Government reservation.

You will take back into governmental control the sovereign prerogative of coining money.

No king ever allowed a subject to coin money.

That's a royal prerogative.

And our Supreme Court has said that when our fathers used the word "coin money" they meant create money, and that the money could be created out of any material the Government saw fit to adopt.

Here is the big stick with which to slay the monster panic.

Here is the club with which to hammer the insatiable dragon of compound interest.

USE IT, MR. PRESIDENT.

Don't let the bankers get you "by the leg."

Don't whine and surrender, as Cleveland did.

Don't have any secret midnight conference with J. P. Morgan, as Cleveland did.

Don't saddle the nation with debt, as Cleveland did.

Stand by the Constitution.

Follow the precedent of Andrew Jackson.

Drive the banks back to legitimate banking, and let all the paper currency be Treasury notes issued by the Government.

If $262,000,000 in bonds were legal, the same amount of Government paper, issued in small notes, will be equally so.

Our fathers put the elasticity feature into our financial system, Mr. President.

It was put there for a wise purpose.

It was intended for an emergency.

The time is here; the urgent need is here; the weapon lies at your hand. Seize it, Mr. President, and slay this monster of panic, which menaces the innocent millions.

[By A. E. Stilwell, president of the Kansas City, Mexico and Orient Railway Company.]

THE CRISIS AND THE REMEDY—AN OUTLINE OF A PLAN FOR CREATING AN ELASTIC CURRENCY.

A number of years ago I foresaw that sooner or later the country would inevitably suffer from the financial condition which now exists. The following plan occurred to me as being a feasible way of relieving the situation, and, after taking the matter up with President McKinley, who looked upon it with favor, I sent an outline to a number of prominent bankers, Senators, and Congressmen. They all agreed with me that the plan could be carried out with success, but as there was at that time no disturbance in business, they did not think it necessary to change existing banking methods, and the matter was dropped. I have thought over the plan continuously since that time, and I believe that if the idea embraced herein were put into operation, the banking interests of this country could be placed on a sound basis, so that we would have the best banking system in existence. This would result in restored confidence, and the present stringency would immediately be relieved.

THE PLAN.

Have Congress pass a bill incorporating the United States bank of discount, to be a bank of issue, with a capital of $300,000,000. The functions of this bank will be:

1. To issue circulation.
2. To discount with its capital the paper of national banks.
3. To insure the deposits in all national banks.

Have the national banks subscribe for the stock exclusively, and provide that the stock can be used with the United States Government in order to secure circulation, in the same manner that Government bonds are now used, every national bank to be required to invest one-fourth of its capital in the stock of this bank; provide that the stock shall draw interest at the rate of 3 per cent, and that if the interest is not earned (a remote contingency) the Government will make up the deficit.

The United States bank of discount will select one representative from the board of directors of the various national banks. This representative will be a resident of the city in which the bank is located, and it will be his duty to report to the United States bank of discount any irregularities which he sees in the management of the bank.

The United States bank of discount will have the right to examine all national banks, just as the Government does now, as this bank insures all of the deposits, and for this reason must know the risk that it takes. This examination simply adds to the safeguarding of the banking system.

The United States bank of discount will issue its currency in the following way only:

Every national bank will have credit with the United States bank of discount for an amount equal to its surplus and capital. This will encourage banks to pay in a large surplus, making an additional safeguard to the entire banking system. The credit may be used as follows:

When the crops are to be moved additional money is required. Suppose, for instance, a bank at Topeka, Kans., has a capital of a quarter of a million dollars, and this bank wishes to avail itself of the credit which it has with the United States bank of discount, the amount being equal to its capital and surplus, $450,000.

The Topeka bank takes to the Kansas City clearing house, which is the representative of the bank of discount in the section, $450,000 of bonds; the clearing house approves the collateral, and gives a certificate to the Topeka bank stating that it is entitled to $450,000 worth of bank notes to be issued by the United States bank of discount. The Topeka bank sends this certificate on to the United States bank of discount, and receives $450,000 of circulation paying at the rate of 5 per cent per annum while out. One-half of this issue must be retired in six months and the balance in one year, or the bank must be liquidated if it is unable to retire the issue in that time. When the bank wishes to pay off the $450,000, it sends this amount of national-bank notes (not gold or silver certificates) to the United States bank of discount, and its collateral is returned by the Kansas City clearing house on order of the United States bank of discount.

This plan immediately creates an elasticity to the currency of the country equal to the capital and surplus of all the national banks in the United States. It will be to the interest of the national banks to build up their surplus, in order that they may have a discount reserve at this bank.

Instead of keeping so much money in New York, they will buy high-grade bonds, such as the Massachusetts savings banks buy, and will keep these for the interest which they earn, knowing that they can be used at any time to secure currency. The United States bank of discount would publish each year a list of high-grade State, city, and railroad bonds in which all national banks could invest and hold to secure circulation when needed. This would create a market for a billion or more of high-grade bonds that the banks would buy and hold, first, for the interest, and second, as they are the basis for the issue of currency by the United States bank of discount.

One of the most important features of the United States bank of discount will be the insurance of all deposits in national banks. In the passbooks issued to depositors in national banks the following might be inserted: "In case this bank should suspend or fail the United States bank of discount will pay all depositors in full within ten days."

In case of suspension or failure the United States bank of discount will have the following ways of reimbursing itself:

1. The assets of the suspended bank.
2. The double liability of the stockholders.
3. The insurance fund created by collecting from each national bank one-fourth of 1 per cent of its average balances for the year. At the end of every three years the United States bank of discount will declare dividends equal to one-half of this insurance fund, which will be distributed to the national banks in proportion to the amount which each has contributed.

The national banks of each State will elect one director of the bank. These directors, in turn, will elect an executive committee, which will have the entire management of the bank.

It should be noted that this plan does not contemplate any change whatsoever in the present national banking methods or in the relation of the national banks to the subtreasury, but is an auxiliary plan, not calculated to cause the uneasiness which radical changes would be apt to involve.

THE RESULTS WHICH THIS BANK WILL ACCOMPLISH.

1. An elasticity to the currency, which will enable the banks to take care of the needs of the country during the time of moving crops.

2. A stability to the national banks, as they could at all times call upon the United States bank of discount for currency to the extent of their capital and surplus.

3. The insurance of all deposits would result in keeping a large amount of money in the banks which is now kept in safe-deposit vaults. This would add largely to the currency in circulation, and at the same time would prevent runs in time of trouble. This insurance of deposits in national banks is as important as fire or life insurance, as safe and proper banking facilities are a necessary element in the business world.

4. This bank could never become a monopoly, as it does business only with national banks, and not with the public. Its business will be limited to the issuing of its notes to the national banks for discount. The only business which it will carry on will be the making of loans to the Government and the insuring of the accounts of national banks.

5. This bank will be located at Washington, and will not be under the control of any one political party, but will be controlled by all the national banks of the United States.

6. It will receive no deposits except those of the Government.

7. The whole country can not then be made to suffer by the fighting among the men who have been caught in Wall street. Each bank will know what it can depend upon in time of need. It will not be affected by stock gambling, and will not be dominated by men who have been carrying on their business on a stock-gambling basis.

If this bank should be incorporated, I am convinced that it would solve the problem now confronting the country in regard to the banking system. If at the same time a bill could be passed in Congress making the short selling of stocks, wheat, corn, or cotton punishable by fine and imprisonment, one of the greatest menaces to the business interests of our land would be removed. The people who own the land and grow the crops ought to control the prices, and not the people who speculate for their own profit.

We have recently read in the papers that a New York man has made a profit of $5,000,000 by the short selling of stocks. The owners of the stocks did not make these low prices, but men who did not own them forced the owners to sell. When timid people see the stocks which they own rapidly falling in price, they are seized with fear and immediately dump their stocks on the market, thus giving an opportunity to other persons to sell short at a great profit. If it is a crime for one man to sell property which he does not own, but some day hopes to own, why is it not a crime to sell the cotton or corn which he does not own, and thus force prices down, compelling the man who owns the cotton or corn to sell at less than the real value of the commodity? Think of the great harm which can be done in times like these by rich speculators who have never done anything to build up the business of the country! The men who, knowing that some concern is struggling to continue its existence, take advantage of this extremity and begin to sell the stock short, are of the greatest harm to the business interests of the land. The stockholders, knowing that the company is having a struggle, begin to fear for the safety of their investment; they see the quotations of the stock going lower day by day, not knowing that the quotations are created by people owning none of the stock, so they immediately begin to dump the stock on the market, thus creating the opportunity which the stock speculator has been looking for. The officers of the struggling corporation have outstanding loans, with the company's stock as collateral, and in order to save their own credit they are compelled to refuse assistance which otherwise they could give to the company. As a result, the company fails because of the short selling of some unscrupulous speculator, who is only waiting, like a vulture, to devour the unfortunate. The protection of business which would result if such a method were punishable, as it should be, would be of inestimable value to the entire country.

A. E. STILWELL.

BROOKLYN, December 9, 1907.

DEAR MR. SULZER: I have read the paper you handed me, embodying your ideas for a Government bank and currency law. I agree that the people collectively should be saved the payment of interest on United States bonds to the extent that national currency is necessary, by paying off the former, retiring national-bank notes, and issuing Government notes as currency instead. But while the latter should be redeemable in lawful money, as are national-bank notes, they should not be made "legal tender." They would be accepted everywhere by the people without that quality. To replace national-bank notes—not legal tender—with legal-tender notes would be a great inflation of the "lawful money" volume in the interest of money lenders and financiers.

The recent increase of public debt, with over $200,000,000 on deposit in national banks, exhibited the unreliability of banks as Government depositories, and was little calculated to relieve conditions.

If Congress will lower the 25 per cent dam so as to permit a portion of the reserves to flow out legally during crop-moving time—somewhat as planned herewith—needed elasticity would be simply and practically provided, without further issues of any kind.

Yours, truly, O. H. SCHREINER.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Please notice Ex-Comptroller Dawes's remarks herewith.

Elasticity of currency and immediate relief to national banks may be given by modifying the law so that reserves shall thereafter be as follows:

	Per cent.
July and August	25
September and October	20
November and December	15
January	17½
February, March, and April (until after April settlements)	20
May	22½
June	25

Banks in central reserve cities would thus be able to loan between August and December $120,000,000, being two-fifths of reserves now required, to be fully restored as above by June.

Such an enactment would abolish rigidity of the reserves, give all needed elasticity during the fall season, and at once relieve the present strain upon New York banks especially by reducing the requirement for reserves.

If the banks in forty "other reserve cities" were compelled to retain their reserves "on hand in lawful money," they would, in like manner, by the Comptroller's abstract of reports, be prepared to contribute $142,000,000 in addition, which would make a total of elasticity at all reserve cities of $262,000,000.

OBJECTIONS TO THE ALDRICH BILL.

MY DEAR SIR: I wish to call your attention to a few of the glaring defects in the "Senate," or "Aldrich bill," that is now proposed as a panacea for panics.

First. It will discredit any national bank putting out such notes or even paying them out over their counters.

Second. This bill will not expand and keep pace with the growth and development of the country.

Third. It would give us at this time only $139,070,413.14 additional or emergency circulation instead of $250,000,000, as its authors announce, tying up an additional reserve with the 6,000 national banks that can never issue these notes to the amount of $110,929,586.86, depriving them and their customers of credits amounting to $554,647,934.30, and as the business and commercial wealth of the country increases the amount of emergency circulation benefits will decrease.

Fourth. The time such notes shall be issued and the amount of issue is too great a responsibility to be placed on any one man.

Fifth. The securities to be taken at 75 per cent of their market value as a basis for circulation, and in case a bank should fail and the Government not realize 75 per cent of the value of the securities, which, being a certain class of designated securities bearing a higher rate of interest, would command a greater premium and be subject to a greater shrinkage in value during a panic. The deficit would be a first lien upon the assets of the bank to the detriment of its creditors.

Sixth. Under this bill a bank with a capital of $10,000,000 and a surplus of $10,000,000 may be permitted to issue $20,000,000 of Aldrich notes and $10,000,000 of bond-secured notes by depositing the amount of its capital in United States bonds at a premium of 4 per cent, or $400,000 and $26,666,666.60 of other securities or $27,066,666.66 taken from the assets of the bank. Would this inspire public confidence in the bank issuing the 6 per cent Aldrich notes, which under the most favorable circumstances can not be issued at a less cost than 8 per cent?

Seventh. Under section 4 of this bill the tax received by the United States Treasury on the Aldrich notes is not to be used as a guaranty fund to redeem these notes, as many are led to believe, but is for the redemption of United States and other notes.

Eighth. Under section 9 of this bill it may be so construed that bond-secured notes may be retired before the other notes if for any reason the Comptroller of the Currency or Secretary of the Treasury might deem it advisable. This should not be permitted.

Ninth. There is danger of inflation through carelessness of redemption of the Aldrich notes by the payment into the Treasury of lawful money by the banks wishing to retire these notes and this money deposited with some depository bank, pending the return of these notes. Such money should be kept in the United States Treasury.

Tenth. The country banks have been criticised for hoarding cash, and yet under section 8 of this bill they are required to increase their legal reserve on hand from two-fifths to two-thirds of 15 per cent of their deposits, thus locking up $110,929,586.86 additional money.

Eleventh. The security for the Aldrich notes is United States bonds and certificates, railroad bonds (not street railway) paying 4 per cent on entire capital for five years past, city or county bonds of communities fifteen years in existence that have not defaulted for ten years in the payment of principal or interest, with a population of 20,000 as per last census.

Banks can not be expected to carry United States bonds, if this measure becomes a law, as they will not do it now. Had they done so we would have more circulation than this bill provides for.

I have no means of knowing, but dare say that there are not a half dozen railroads in the United States whose bonds could be accepted under this measure.

There are but 232 cities in the United States with a population, according to the last census, of 20,000 inhabitants or over, and how many of that may have defaulted in payment of either principal or interest during the past ten years we have no means of knowing. Under this measure there are thirteen States and Territories that do not have a city of 20,000 in them, and the following is the number of such cities in each State:

Alabama	3	Montana	1
Arkansas	1	New Hampshire	3
California	5	Nebraska	3
Colorado	3	New Jersey	15
Connecticut	7	New York	20
Delaware	1	North Carolina	2
District of Columbia	1	Ohio	15
Florida	1	Oregon	1
Georgia	4	Pennsylvania	20
Illinois	12	Rhode Island	4
Indiana	8	South Carolina	2
Iowa	10	Tennessee	4

After carefully considering this, how many Members of Congress are there who have not a city in their district that could furnish such bonds, and why this discrimination against the smaller cities? Why is this measure so drawn that only a limited few railroad securities are acceptable, and why are the securities confined to such a limited list?

The securities required are such as are not carried by scarcely a bank of the country class, or those required to carry a 15 per cent reserve, and if this bill should become a law, instead of being of any benefit to them, it would be a positive detriment, as compared with the present law, and instead of preventing a panic, when its provisions are understood, it would more likely cause one, and leave the country banks entirely at the mercy of their customers, with an additional handicap in the way of a reserve, and a surer chance for Federal imprisonment for violation of the national banking act.

If the Members of Congress have the interest of their constituents at heart, and their future, they will vote "no" on this measure, as its passage would be worse than no legislation.

Yours, truly,

JOHN L. HAMILTON.

REFERRING TO THE ALDRICH BILL AND THE INCORPORATION OF CLEARING HOUSES UNDER A FEDERAL LAW.

[Letter read before a meeting of Group Eleven of the Iowa State Bankers' Association, held at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, February 22, 1908.]

QUINCY, ILL., February 20, 1908.

To the Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been asked by friends, both east and west, to write to you in regard to the Aldrich bill now pending in Congress. You may think that I write from both a political and bankers' standpoint; I would rather have anything I might say considered in the interest of the borrowing class, and as an economic question.

Well-managed banks have earned and paid dividends even in the severest panics from 1837 up to this time. Other business interests are even more than banks adversely affected by a severe panic and sudden contraction of credits. With the increased production of gold we have at present a redundancy of currency—including, of course, the demand issues of the Government. Since last August there has been more money in the hands of the people than in the bank vaults. Should the Aldrich bill be passed as introduced, it will not meet the requirements in the movement of the crops or other situations in future panics. Bank members of the clearing-house associations will still have to take out clearing-house certificates, as has been done during every panic since the civil war and the introduction of Government paper issues.

I will state only a few reasons why I think the Aldrich bill is not likely to benefit business interests.

First. There is, as stated, a redundancy of paper issues and there is no necessity at present for an emergency circulation.

Second. Legislation should be nonpartisan and in the right direction, anticipating the future growth and needs of the country, both in respect to the development of domestic and foreign commerce. Neither the Aldrich nor the Fowler bills are receiving the indorsement of business men generally, especially in the South and West, where currency issues should be easily and quickly put out to assist the movement of crops and equalize the rates of interest; New York should be relieved of the annual strain upon her resources. Provision should also be made for an emergency circulation to be immediately issued through clearing-house organizations in every part of the country when a financial crisis is on. This, too, without encroaching upon bank reserves, and making it possible for banks not to contract credits. "We have had stringency in the money market every fall for forty years, and it has produced panic after panic." "The panic of last October only indorsed the lesson of the panics from 1857 to 1893, in demonstrating beyond denial that perfectly solvent banks, if isolated units, without cooperation, can not protect themselves and save themselves from failures without such suspension of payments as to produce demoralization in all the business of their customers."—Ridgely.

Third. The Aldrich bill limits its operation to national banks and on the security of bonds (held almost altogether in the East) representing fixed capital, exposing the country to increased issue of bonds and inflation of bank issues. The national banks in our country number, say, 6,500. There are nearly 20,000 banking institutions in the United States closely connected with banks comprising clearing-house associations. Their assets represent gold, silver, currency issues, banking-house properties, business paper (which does not fluctuate in value like bond issues of all kinds), real estate mortgage loans, and bonds.

Fourth. Taking a long view of the matter, no party can afford to force a financial measure through the present Congress with very general objections to a bill by the business interests in the South and West.

Fifth. If the Aldrich bill is to be forced through at this session of Congress, and the bill introduced by the American Bankers' Association is not to be considered, then let the Aldrich bill be changed and amended, by sections taken from Senate bill No. 108, providing for the incorporation of clearing houses under a Federal law and with power to issue currency to its bank members on the pledge of selected bank assets, and with clearing-house rules to enforce its retirement at any time.

The clearing-house associations in some States represent a larger banking power than any of the governmental banks of the world. Their issues would have, besides selected securities passed upon by the practical committees of clearing houses, the mutual guaranty of all the associated banks, and their clearing-house notes would be absolutely safe and under strict regulations for redemption at many centers, and when not needed would be redeemed even more rapidly than issued. Clearing-house associations have always caused early redemption of clearing-house certificates.

The true basis of sound banking is commercial paper, used as it is in governmental banks abroad, such paper representing circulating or liquid capital. In addition to the gold in their vaults, it was the basis of bank circulation in New England under the Suffolk bank system, which bank notes were, at the time of their issue, at a premium in the West.

The sections referred to, added to the Aldrich bill, would, as has been stated, afford the simplest and most effective means for giving elasticity to the currency, and consequent stability to commerce and trade. It would not require any changes or amendments to the national banking act; but it would be a supplementary measure, if not a rounding out of the national banking system, bringing the banking machinery of the country under Government supervision and control. There is centralization in the European system of banking, and the weakness of our system is decentralization. The incorporation of clearing houses under a Federal law, with authority to issue clearing-house certificates and notes, would, by combining the entire assets of its individual members, centralize their resources and, as hereinbefore stated, furnish facilities surpassing even the power of governmental banks in Europe.

Sixth. The Aldrich bill provides for an addition of five hundred millions to the volume of paper issues, and without any addition to the gold reserves of the banks. That is a dangerous power, in the direction of inflation. The smaller national banks in the South and West have already taken out circulation to the amount of their capital.

Custom-house duties and internal-revenue receipts taken from the lifeblood of commerce and deposited, as they are, with the subtreasuries instead of in banks, contributes toward the monetary stringency every fall, as well as at other seasons. Crops should be moved without our having to look to Washington for help periodically as well as in times of panic.

Seventh. Considering the bond deposits to secure these issues, it would lead to the organization of bond syndicates, speculative transactions, to the prejudice of agricultural sections of the country and resulting in more or less graft. It would not contribute to hold down interest rates, and even with the 6 per cent tax on emergency circulation, speculation would not be prevented, and call, as well as time money would go to high levels as it has reached in years gone by.

Eighth. With the surprising development of our country and its increasing public revenues, it can not be many years before the Government will be able to retire its bonded indebtedness, and such bonds can not therefore always be depended upon as a basis for national-bank circulation. The enormous growth of deposits and clearing-house transactions and their prospective increase in the West and South emphasize the value and use which should be made of clearing-house facilities as indicated. Take only two Western cities as an illustration:

The deposits in Chicago clearing-house banks in 1873 were	$28,651,000
In 1907 they were	561,932,000
These figures do not include nonmember deposits of	67,573,000
Chicago clearing-house exchanges in 1880 were	1,725,684,894
In 1907 they were	12,087,647,870
The Kansas City (a much younger city) clearing-house figures in 1881 were	420,100,554
In 1907 they were	1,649,375,013

The above figures were furnished to me by the managers of clearing houses in the cities named.

The issue of currency should be based upon business transactions, as it was before the civil war. Bank issues and their redemption would then respond automatically to the extension and contraction of business.

As it was thought the civil war could not be conducted on a specie basis (England's wars have been for over a hundred years), Treasury notes were issued and made a legal tender. Business transactions on the Pacific coast were always conducted on a gold basis. So long as Treasury notes are outstanding they will be a menace to sound banking principles, as they were in the seventies, when an inflation of Treasury notes was advocated in opposition to the resumption of specie payments.a Later on, in the nineties, when the standard of value was threatened by the purchase of silver, inflation was encouraged by the issue of silver certificates—another menace. In the present Congress a further issue of Government demand obligations may be advocated.

The fixed and irredeemable demand issues of the Government and bond-secured national-bank issues can never be made to respond to the conditions of trade; fluctuating market prices of bonds have always affected the volume of national-bank issues.

Comptroller Ridgely has recently called attention to the fact that "in 1891 the outstanding circulation of national banks reached the lowest point in the life of the system since 1865—only about $167,000,000, representing 10 per cent of the stock of money in the United States. There was very little variation from that percentage up to 1900, when the proportion increased to 13.23. On June 20, 1907, national-bank notes represented 19.38 per cent of the money in the United States."

In the panic last fall, and after the enormous withdrawal of money from the New York City banks, the necessity of wise precautions in the country at large were obvious to all interests. It was the action of the Clearing House Association of Chicago—after the suspension of money payments—which first issued clearing-house checks, and which were perfectly secured.

They met the demands of labor and trade and were used in other parts of the West. So you have an illustration of their value, and in times of the greatest stress. It is not, then, a theoretical proposition. A sound principle has been practically and successfully applied in your own State of Illinois. Do you say that these clearing-house certificates and checks were extra legal? Then let Congress now legalize their future issue. The remedy lies with the Congress of the United States.

Such a rounding out of the banking system as I have indicated, and all under Government supervision and control, would prevent a sudden contraction of credits and widespread panics, and thus protect all business interests.

In my opinion, the consideration and enactment of some such legislation as is indicated in this letter should precede any consideration of a central or "semi-Government bank," if that is thought to be desirable as part of a general reform.

As Charles A. Conant has well said: "Our present financial system is the outgrowth of Treasury needs of 1863. It handicaps this country in the contest with financial rivals as completely as an old side-wheeler of 1863 would be handicapped in the race across the ocean with the Lusitania or the Mauretania, or as the old wooden ship of the line would be outclassed under the fire of a modern battle ship."

Yours, respectfully,

E. J. PARKER.

CENTRAL BANK THE CURE, SAYS NASH—PRESIDENT OF CORN EXCHANGE INDORSES VIEWS OF E. H. HOLDEN, CABLED TO THE WORLD.

William A. Nash, president of the Corn Exchange Bank, said yesterday, speaking of the cable dispatch to the World of E. H. Holden, the English expert in finance, holding that a central bank would go a far way toward curing the financial ills of the United States and referring to the Corn Exchange Bank as an example and to President Nash as the kind of a manager the banks need:

"It is evident that Mr. Holden has a clear understanding of the situation in this country. My own views as to a central bank are well known.

"The magnetic needle does not point more unerringly to the pole than the clearing-house certificates point to a great central bank, and, dodge this as we may, and probably will, finally we shall come back to it and hail it as the solution of all our difficulties.

"But such a bank must be organized properly or it will never gain public confidence. The Government must be represented in it, but the dominant power must reside in a board of directors, to which the most eminent bankers and business men shall be chosen. Let the clearing-houses of the great central reserve cities nominate those directors and you will have a governing body as influential and as respected as the Supreme Court of the United States.

"It is hardly necessary to say that political or partisan features in such a bank will be fatal. To give it authority and respect it must be divorced from party politics. Its creation will be a work of patriotism as signal as any we have ever performed as a people."

President Nash referred to the clearing-house certificates to illustrate his point of the need of a central governing power such as Mr. Holden advocates.

"They have been used eight times in the past half century," said he, "always with relief instantaneous, without loss, and with a period of existence from the first one put in circulation to the last one retired of about four months. As an emergency currency it is incomparable; as an asset currency it is the only one that I can conceive of that is not fraught with dangers greatly in excess of the benefits to be derived from it. The secret of the whole matter lies in the character of the men who manage it.

"I do not hesitate to say that an asset currency authorized on a 40 per cent or any per cent basis and intrusted to 5,000 banks all over the country will surely result in a cataclysm of disaster unparalleled in the history of the country. On the other hand, if we organize a permanent form of clearing-house certificate, so lately issued and so fitfully, we will provide the country in advance with a remedy. The whole proposition comes down to that of having a great central bank."

THE PEOPLE, REPRESENTED BY THE UNITED STATES MONETARY LEAGUE, APPEAL TO CONGRESS AGAINST ASSET, CREDIT, OR FLEXIBLE CURRENCY.

The proposed currency schemes, as fathered by the national-bank trust, the Bankers' Association, and sponsored by President Roosevelt, contains within it more elements of mischief, wrong, outrage, and dishonesty than is possible by any other Congressional enactment. So far-reaching, so terribly destructive of the best interests of the people, so promotive of debauchery, robbery, graft, and special privileges, it seems impossible to conceive of a United States Congress enacting into law such plain violations of all decency and equity. This scheme has been hatched by the so-called "great financiers," but most of them mere human leeches, vultures, who, for the past forty-four years, have plied their intellects and brains to study out ways and means for more adroitly plundering the innocent and unsuspecting and the whole nation. To such men, whose business and habits of life have been to gain wealth by their wits, has been delegated the "honor" of bringing forth a measure ostensibly for the good of the country. Great Heavens! What a thinly disguised scheme to, under the form of law, further and more effectually rob the productive industries of the people. And to more easily accomplish their vile purpose they make war upon the silver dollar and the greenback. This good money pays no tribute to the pirates; it is the last vestige of the people's free money, which every man, woman, and child knows is good. This money they would destroy, even though the people starve by it. They want to force the people to use their vicious substitute for money to gratify their greed for gold. And the President of the United States, supposed to hold his office only to promote the general welfare, shows himself to be the agent or attorney of the bank trust in its effort to destroy all the money of the people upon which the banks can not impose interest or control its use. (See his messages to Congress.)

These elementary propositions and principles of honest money are so simple in their application that it is impossible to believe that men of the intellectual capacity of public servants, whether legislative or executive, do not understand fully the intent and purpose of these closely allied schemes—asset currency and destruction of silver and paper money; and their course can be explained only on the hypothesis that they are ready to quiet their conscience, if any remains, by asserting that their conception of duty leads them to walk in the paths and by-ways commanded by the "captains of industry," the robbers of the producer; they who grow fat upon the labor of women and children, or by the creation of evidence of debt through the machinery of the printing press, the stock exchanges, and a subservient, facile Congress, as well as by an administration ready and anxious to do the bidding of that unholy exponent of greed and avarice—the national-bank money trust.

THE REMEDY, OR THE JUST WAY.

We hereby voice the demand of the people for plain, simple, equal justice to all; that Congress create money as authorized by the Constitution and validated by the Supreme Court, gold, silver, and greenbacks or Treasury notes, every dollar equal and a full legal tender for debt; and that money so created shall be paid into circulation for Government obligations and without the intervention of banks, leaving banks to do business on their own money, in the same manner as others do.

Respectfully submitted.

NEW YORK STATE BANKERS' ASSOCIATION,
New York City, February 26, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM SULZER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The New York State Bankers' Association has, through its council of administration, a body which represents the important banking interests of the whole State as well as the city of New York, taken an active interest in the prospective currency legislation which is now under consideration by both Houses of Congress.

Our association distinctly disapproves of the Aldrich bill as a whole, believing that if this bill becomes a law the best interests of the citizens of the country will not be subserved; that its ultimate results would be disastrous to our commercial interests; and, notwithstanding the manifest necessity for relief from the present situation, it would be preferable to have no legislation at all, rather than that this unwise measure become a law.

NOTE.—Executive Mansion, April 22, 1874. Herewith I return Senate bill No. 617, entitled "An act to fix the amount of United States notes and the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes," without my approval. * * *

(Signed) U. S. GRANT.

At a recent meeting of the council of administration the following resolution was unanimously adopted, namely:

"Resolved, That the bankers of the State of New York unqualifiedly disapprove of the provisions of the Aldrich bill; that they do not approve of a bond emergency currency; that they demand an elastic currency based on bank assets, as provided in the measure of the currency commission of the American Bankers' Association."

May I ask you to give me your views, saying whether you agree or disagree with the ideas above expressed. I inclose stamped envelope, and, awaiting your response, am,

Very truly, yours, E. O. ELDREDGE, Secretary.

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
February 15, 1908.

To Hon. WILLIAM SULZER,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: We beg leave to call your attention to the inclosed report of our committee on bankruptcy and commercial law in condemnation of the Aldrich emergency currency bill, which report was accepted and approved by a unanimous vote of our board of directors.

We earnestly trust that, for the reasons set forth in the report, you will oppose the passage of the bill.

Respectfully, yours,

THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK,
By S. C. MEAD, Secretary.

IN OPPOSITION TO ALDRICH CURRENCY BILL—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON BANKRUPTCY AND COMMERCIAL LAW, THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK—UNANIMOUSLY APPROVED BY THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS JANUARY 27, 1908.

To the board of directors of the Merchants' Association of New York.

GENTLEMEN: Your committee on bankruptcy and commercial law, to which was referred the subject of the reform of the currency laws, begs leave to report as follows:

Immediately after the subject came before the committee a careful and thorough study was undertaken, to which end conferences were held with Paul M. Warburg, esq., of Messrs. Kuhn, Loeb & Co., representing the central bank plan; Hon. Charles A. Conant, representing the plan of the currency commission of the American Bankers' Association; Victor Morawetz, esq., representing a plan for the extension of the clearing-house system; and Hon. CHARLES N. FOWLER, chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of the House of Representatives.

As the result of our deliberations we present the following resolution, which has been unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That this committee on bankruptcy and commercial law disapproves Senate bill No. 3023, entitled 'A bill to amend the national banking laws,' introduced by Senator ALDRICH, for the following reasons:

"1. They regard as essentially unsound the principle embodied therein, that a currency should be based upon fixed securities of any description. The note issues as well as the deposits of a bank are obligations payable on demand, and the bank should hold as security against such liabilities nothing but quick assets, such as actual cash, secured notes payable on demand, or commercial paper liquidating itself at par at the end of a short period of months. It is no safe function for a bank of deposit or issue to invest assets held against demand obligations in long-term notes, bonds or mortgages, the conversion of which into cash in times of stringency can only be accomplished at sacrifice of the principal, if at all. The policy which might reasonably create an artificial market for the national obligations in time of civil war can not excuse an extension of the same favor to State or municipal bonds and railroad mortgages in time of peace.

"2. The high tax which this bill proposes to levy upon the issue of emergency currency, and which in the last analysis would be paid by the borrower to the banks, when increased as it would be in practice at least one-third by reserve requirements, is not only unnecessary but oppressive; and in this and other States would provoke an immediate disregard of the statutes against usury. It is not becoming that a great nation should fill its coffers from the necessities of borrowers; and it is manifestly improper to pass one law which offers inducements to the violation of another."

It is the unanimous opinion of your committee, as evidenced by the signatures hereto, that rather than accept legislation of the character of the Aldrich bill, which we feel in its ultimate results would be most disastrous to the commercial interests of the country, it would be preferable to have no legislation at all, in spite of the manifest necessity of some relief to the present intolerable situation.

We therefore in accordance with this resolution recommend that the association disapprove Senate bill 3023, known as the "Aldrich bill," and that it take steps actively to oppose the enactment into law of this or any bill passed upon these principles.

Your committee, which is continuing consideration and study of other measures, will render an additional report in the very near future.

Respectfully submitted.

HOW THE "CARDS," I. E., MONEY, ARE "STACKED" BY OPERATION OF NATIONAL LAW—NONPOLITICAL BASIS OF PREDATORY WEALTH, DISCONTENT AND SOCIALISM.

The Comptroller of the Currency is "charged with the execution of all laws relating to the issue and regulation of a national currency secured by United States bonds," and with general supervision of national banks.

Section 5191, United States Revised Statutes (act of June 3, 1864) formerly required every national bank to "at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States," at least 25 per cent, or 15 per cent, as the case may be, of the amount of its notes in circulation and its deposits.

Section 5192 provides that three-fifths of 15 per cent reserves "may consist of balances due to an association, available for the redemption of its circulating notes," from associations in designated cities, approved by the Comptroller.

Section 5195 provides that each association in any of the cities named in section 5151 ("other reserve cities," stated below) shall select an association in the city of New York, "at which it will redeem its circulating notes," and may keep one-half of its lawful money reserve in cash deposits in the city of New York.

Act of June 20, 1874 (section 2), provides that associations shall thereafter—"not be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations;" but the moneys required to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits. Also (section 3) that every association shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money, "a sum equal to 5 per cent of its circulation, to be held and used for the redemption of such circulation; which sum shall be counted as a part of its lawful reserve." Also that so much of said national bank act "requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this section, is hereby repealed."

Act March 3, 1887, provides that whenever three-fourths in number of the national banks located in any city having a population of 50,000 shall make application to the Comptroller asking that the name of the city in which such banks are located shall be added to the list of cities named in sections 5191 and 5192, the Comptroller may grant such requests, and every bank located in such city "shall at all times thereafter have on hand in lawful money" an amount equal to at least 25 per cent of its deposits. Also (section 2) whenever three-fourths of national banks located in any city having a population of 200,000 shall make application asking that such city may be a central reserve city, like the city of New York, in which one-half of the lawful money reserves of banks located in other reserve cities may be deposited, as provided in section 5195, such requests may be granted. And that every bank located in such city "shall at all times thereafter have on hand in lawful money," 25 per cent of its deposits.

Only Chicago and St. Louis banks have availed thereof.

Act of March 3, 1903, provides: That whenever three-fourths of banks located in any city having a population of 25,000 shall make application asking that the name of the city in which such banks are located shall be added to the cities named in sections 5191 and 5192, such requests may be granted, and every bank located in such city "shall at all times thereafter have on hand in lawful money" 25 per cent of its deposits.

The foregoing synopsis shows that the laws governing and regulating national-bank reserves, from first to last, and as late as March 3, 1903, require the reserves to be at all times kept "on hand in lawful money." The permission in section 5192 that three-fifths of 15 per cent reserves may consist of balances due from associations in designated cities, and in section 5195 that each association in designated cities may keep one-half of 25 per cent reserves in cash deposits in New York (now also in Chicago or St. Louis), were apparently intended to provide for redemption at such cities of circulating notes, and not to nullify the repeated demand of law above quoted, by enabling loan and disbursement of 75 per cent of such deposits. The requirement to so redeem was repealed by act of June 20, 1874, section 3, as above quoted.

The total of deposited reserves was less than $100,000,000 up to 1898, but has rapidly increased as follows from official reports:

September 20, 1898	$94,394,210.64
September 7, 1899	154,514,691.64
September 5, 1900	176,731,918.08
September 30, 1901	216,763,488.34
September 15, 1902	253,515,055.97
September 9, 1903	227,780,147.03
September 6, 1904	258,558,149.91
August 25, 1905	291,732,471.82
November 9, 1905	294,250,607.92
January 29, 1906	295,941,972.45

An increase of over 200 per cent in seven years, amounting at the latter date to nearly one-half of all reserves required throughout the United States, except at "central" reserve cities. Trusts, financial juggles, and stock-exchange transactions have grown apace therewith, because 75 per cent of such deposited reserves is continuously available to foster same. Transactions in shares increased during these years over 300 per cent.

These indisputable figures mark the growth of a monetary discrimination, thereby supplanting natural economic conditions and just flow of money, under which a just share of prosperity would accrue to all the people.

Boston and Philadelphia national banks, these not being "central" reserve cities, constantly contribute one-half of their reserves to the Wall street money market by depositing same in New York banks to obtain interest thereon, because they can not lawfully loan same at home.

Boston banks thus lacked at home November 9, 1905, $20,730,259.62.

Philadelphia banks thus lacked at home November 9, 1905, $33,598,623.25.

The act of June 20, 1874, as stated above, repealed the previous requirements to keep on hand 15 per cent or 25 per cent of notes in circulation and replaced same by a requirement to keep only 5 per cent thereof in the Treasury of the United States, "which sum shall be counted as a part of its lawful reserve" against deposits. But for this latter singular requirement the reserves deposited as stated would appear greater, as they really are, and on November 9, 1905, $314,501,483.61, and January 29, 1906, $316,782,814.88, instead of as above.

The designated cities are now as follows: "Central" reserve cities, New York, Chicago, and St. Louis.

"Other reserve cities"—Boston, Albany, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Baltimore, Washington, D. C., Savannah, New Orleans, Louisville, Houston, Dallas, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Columbus, Indianapolis, Detroit, Milwaukee, Des Moines, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Kansas City, Kans., Kansas City, Mo., St. Joseph, Lincoln, Omaha, Denver, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Portland, Oreg., Fort Worth, Dubuque, Wichita, Salt Lake City, Cedar Rapids.

"Country banks." Under this head are included banks of the following cities of 100,000 to 350,000 population, viz: Buffalo, Newark (N. J.), Jersey City, Providence, Rochester, Toledo, Allegheny, Worcester, Syracuse, New Haven, Paterson, Fall River, Memphis, and Scranton. Also banks of 112 cities below 100,000 population and over 25,000 and of all smaller cities, etc.

The 283 banks in 35 "other reserve cities," as above, though themselves reserve agents for "country banks," are permitted to deposit in banks of New York, Chicago, or St. Louis one-half of their own 25 per cent reserves.

The greater proportion of deposited reserves is with banks in New York City. Such money, being subject to recall by banks depositing same, is mainly loaned "on demand" and short-time loans to bankers and members of the New York Stock Exchange. Originally disbursed by national banks, it has begotten loans also by State banks, trust companies, etc. The reserves disbursed at New York average more than $100,000 for each of 1,100 members of the stock exchange; and estimating by the proportion of loans and discounts in all banking institutions in New York to their total cash held, each $100,000 cash maintains more than $500,000 in loans. Thus over $500,000,000 in loans have been unnaturally and unjustly provided to enable corporate capitalizations to be toyed with, "watered," and "floated" by stock-exchange methods, the total of loans November 9, 1905, by all banking institutions in New York on stocks, bonds, etc., being over a billion dollars. The borrowings of single firms to carry stocks for their customers sometimes amount to upward of $10,000,000.

Means, opportunity, and incitement have been thereby provided for people of small means to risk their all on narrow margins, and for money dealers and the already rich to exploit the railroads, industries, and products of the country, by trusts, mergers, combines, corners, and false capitalizations, for their further enrichment.

Clearing-house returns from 105 cities in the United States show that those at New York alone, owing to unnatural conditions and stimulated stock-exchange transactions, amount to far more than all the rest combined. (Financial Chronicle.) The manager of the New York Clearing House estimates them at 68 per cent of all.

Single memberships of the stock exchange have recently sold as high as $93,000.

Money in circulation was below $14, equivalent of gold per head of 35,000,000 population at the close of the civil war in 1865, and is now over $30 per head of 80,000,000 population. The natural flow of so great an increase should have furnished the only source of surplus supply to the money market.

The business of the stock exchange consists mainly of hazards, which are essentially bets as to the future of prices, and so akin to gambling that they should never receive the support of national law. But what a departure from just and equal laws do we behold! About $30 of money exists per head for the people at large, but under operation of the national banking law there stands subtracted therefrom an average of $100,000 or more per head for each of 1,100 members of the stock exchange. So that the stock exchange has the support of discriminative national law. What wonder that its progeny of corporations and fabulous capitalizations dominate the country.

Some classes of corporations are under rigid supervision, State or national, and can have no watered shares. Others, organized for transportation, communication, illumination, or production of constant necessities to family and business life, are not so controlled. Shares, and sometimes bonds issued by these, are greatly watered at will of those who organize or control them. Why this distinction between creatures of law? Lax and varying State laws are availed of for organization and false capitalization, because national law by unnatural concentration of money furnishes means to accomplish the wrong.

Thus exist two ways of acquiring capital: One for the incorporated few who can avail of unrighteous law for quick enrichment, the other for the great body of people not incorporated, who must toil for dollars, and live frugally, if they would accumulate even for "rainy days" or their declining years.

Artificial persons, i. e., corporations, or those who control them, should never have been permitted to assume or usurp acts and proceedings which natural persons, however numerously associated, can never collectively exercise; for the creator is thereby made secondary and tributary to the creature.

To print and issue false tokens of single dollars is to counterfeit. And they who do it are condemned to imprisonment. To print and issue false tokens of capital or multiplied dollars, in limitless amounts, is to finance. And they who do it, and gain most thereby, are lauded as ablest exemplars of success among men.

True capital is the friend and ally of labor of every class and grade, but false capital thus fastened upon corporations is its oppressor, and has estranged them, for the body of capital seeking income has been unnaturally and enormously increased thereby, enabling selfishness and greed to tax, oppress, and defraud the people.

The Interstate Commerce Commission finds that the interstate railroad system of the country is owned by much less than one-half of 1 per cent of the population. Congress is legislating to prevent favoritism and wrongs in their operation. But it can not be curative of the underlying wrongful cause enabling most of this unnatural and concentrated ownership, viz, unnatural concentration of money, and credits built thereon. Better no compulsory reserves whatever than their wrongful disbursement and use at favored localities.

The permissions enabling reserves to be deposited and loaned have converted the plain demand of the law as quoted above to its very opposite, and instead of being faithfully held for the only justifiable purpose of law in compelling the money to be withheld from local public use, viz, to protect depositors, they are made a tender for speculative money supply and basis for illegitimate ventures.

The high protective tariff has long been a bone of political contention, and Democrats denounce it as father of the trusts. But unnatural and lopsided distribution of money reserves and credits based thereon has been the nourishing mother of their great watered capitalizations.

A veritable hotbed for corporate syndicates, mergers, trusts, "corners," and monopolies has been thus provided, individual competition and opportunity thereby throttled and destroyed, and small industries of the many made profitless.

Even unnatural excesses in life insurance are traceable thereto.

Rich indeed is our country and great its seeming prosperity. But multimillionaires, and their colossal fortunes acquired as by a magician's wand, attest national injustice to be their foundation.

The plain intent and implication of law was, and is, that the reserves should be maintained sacred and unimpaired for the purpose for which they are everywhere compelled to be withheld. Nowhere does there exist direct permission for loaning any portion of same. Section 5192 implies the contrary by indicating special deposits. It is a monstrous travesty upon just law that thus (as on November 9, 1905) compels money to be continuously withheld by 5,770 banks throughout the country, and its use thereby denied at any of such 5,770 banks, to be afterwards concentrated and 75 per cent thereof loaned at 63 (practically fewer) other and favored banks.

Whether it be attributed to unjust and unequal law, or (with great reason) to its faulty execution, such is its practical operation, and the Government is thereby responsible for the baneful results.

What means the plain injunction of law, frequently repeated, that banks must "at all times" have their reserves "on hand in lawful money?"

What more effective method could be devised to enable flotation of excessive watered capitalizations, which have been an invariable purpose in creation of monopolistic trusts and corporations, railroad and industrial, and from which have resulted towering aggregations of predatory wealth which exact tribute by great incomes and absorb just earnings?

The great natural law of demand and supply, which alone should regulate the ebb and flow of the tide of lawful money, has, by permitted use of the reserves at favored cities, been overridden in favor of the few and already rich who could avail of such use. And the ocean of money thereby provided has enabled limitless "graft" from the people by the deals, syndicates, and capitalistic juggles of "high finance."

Let it be clearly understood that the deposited reserves came from 5,770 banks throughout the United States, being all except 63 banks in central reserve cities; that by each of these 5,770 banks its portion was withheld from local use by command of law for the only justifiable purpose of such command of law, namely, as a money reserve; that such command of law is an absolute denial of the loan or use of any portion of same at the 5,770 points of origination of the vast total, and, therefore, that the permissions to deposit, whereby 75 per cent of such deposits are loaned, principally in Wall street, constitute a preference in law or its administration for the use of this proportion of the money volume of the country.

SUCH UNJUST DISTRIBUTION OF MONEY HAS PRODUCED, AND WILL CONTINUE TO PRODUCE, UNJUST DISTRIBUTION OF PROPERTY AND WEALTH.

In vain will righteousness and justice between man and man be consistently inculcated so long as this root of national *un*righteousness and *in*justice continues to widen disparities and ripen its fruits of predaceous wealth and luxury on the one hand, and hard conditions of living and progress in the world on the other.

Substantial repeal of the permissions was recommended by Comptroller Dawes in his annual report December, 1900, to Congress, in which he discussed the danger, which had made itself apparent years before, of continuing the practice. Even a gradual repeal or correction, first making it apply only to Philadelphia and Boston banks, would probably distress Wall street. But there is a consideration more important to the people of this country than regard for stimulated Wall street prosperity, viz: Equal laws and public justice, especially regarding the supply of money, which is the basis of credits, life blood of all undertakings, and measure of all values. Otherwise liberty fails and becomes a sham.

National legislators especially, and American citizens everywhere, should understand that national law furnishes exclusive meat to fatten financial Cæsars.

O. H. SCHREINER.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the prophecy which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] has just made as to forthcoming political events, I address the House with some trepidation. It is not my purpose to indulge in a discussion of political questions now, not that I would not be glad to do so, but because I prefer to discuss questions that are germane to the pending bill. For the time being we have had, I think, enough discussion of the tariff question and other political questions, and we have certainly had enough quotations from the Bible by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN] to meet the spiritual needs of the House for the day. I want to remind him, however, in reply to his remarks regarding the failure of the Republican majority to enact certain pension legislation, that every pension act that has been passed since the civil war has been passed by a Republican Congress, and that every vote that was ever cast in Congress during that period against pension legislation was cast by some gentleman who did not belong to the Republican party and practically all of them by Democrats.

Mr. Chairman, no one can justly accuse the United States Government of not having dealt in a spirit of the broadest liberality with its soldiers and sailors, their widows and dependents. The latest statistical abstract shows that up to and including the year 1906 this Government had paid for pensions the startling sum of nearly three and a half billions of dollars. Add to that the amount paid during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, and the amount that will have been paid by the close of the current fiscal year, and we have the gigantic total of nearly three billions eight hundred millions of dollars that this Government has paid out for pensions. This is an exhibit unparalleled in the history of nations. And yet, Mr. Chairman, in spite of this splendid record there are some inequalities, some elements of injustice, in our pension system, that ought to be eliminated—some laches that ought to be remedied. To these I desire to address myself briefly to-day.

First of all I invite attention to the class of soldiers referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAMLIN], the militiamen of certain States, particularly the border States, who have not been provided for, but who are more entitled to pension than are thousands of those already on the rolls. In a great many instances, at least, these militia organizations were enlisted by authority of the United States, and although they were never mustered into the service of the United States, they cooperated with its armed forces and rendered actual and valuable service in the suppression of the rebellion. In my own State of Kentucky several battalions were organized and placed at the disposal of the Federal authorities and under the command of Federal officers, and in obedience to their orders often went beyond the confines of the State. They did guard duty at bridges, on railroads, and with wagon trains, undergoing great exposure and many hardships. I could give the names of scores of these men who, by order of Federal officers, took push boats up and down the Big Sandy River, carrying supplies to the Union forces, and who, while engaged in the performance of that duty alone, rendered more arduous, more hazardous, and more valuable service to the Union cause than thousands who have title to pension under existing law.

These Kentucky militiamen served side by side with the soldiers of the Regular and Volunteer Armies of the United States. Many of them were killed in battle, many were made prisoners of war, and many contracted disabilities and received wounds and injuries in the line of duty. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I know personally that a great many of them did not understand their exact military status, believing that they were regularly in the service of the United States, and I know also that a great many of them were still under that impression until a great many years after the war had closed.

There is another reason, Mr. Chairman, why these Kentucky militiamen are entitled to the special consideration of the nation. It is a matter of history that at one time a supreme effort was made by the Confederate authorities to wrest Kentucky from her allegiance to the Union, and I believe it is generally conceded that but for these militia organizations that effort would have been successful. If it had been, who can tell what effect that action might have had upon her neighbor States, or, for that matter, upon the Union cause itself? I do not believe that you gentlemen of the North are lacking in appreciation of the service that was rendered the Union cause in these border States, but I do believe that you do not fully understand the conditions under which these men rendered that service. It meant something, Mr. Chairman, to be loyal to the Union there in those days—much more than it meant in the hills of New England. It meant ostracism—social and political—in many sections of these States, and sometimes worse even than that. If you would read Speed's History of the Union Cause in Kentucky, I do not believe that a single one of you would oppose the passage of a bill for the relief of these militiamen.

The United States Government has, in a measure, recognized its obligation for their services by reimbursing the States for their expenses in that connection, but it has not given the men themselves the pensionable status to which, in justice and equity, they are entitled. When I say that the service which these militiamen rendered to the Union cause entitles them, in justice and equity, to a pensionable status, I challenge any gentleman on this floor successfully to refute the statement.

I introduced a bill at this session for the purpose of providing a pensionable status for this long-neglected class of the Union's defenders. That bill is now in the hands of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. I prepared it after a most thorough consideration of the whole subject, and in doing so I was aided by the ten years' experience I had as an examiner in the Pension Office and as a member of the board of pension appeals. The bill referred to is as follows:

[H. R. 16095, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

A bill to extend the provisions of the pension laws to officers and enlisted men of State military organizations who rendered military service to the Union during the war of the rebellion, and to their widows, minor children, and dependent parents.

Whereas the officers and enlisted men of military organizations of certain States who, while cooperating with the armed forces of the United States and acting under the command of United States officers, rendered actual and valuable service to the cause of the Union during the war of the rebellion and aided in its suppression; and

Whereas such officers and enlisted men and their widows, minor children, and dependent parents are barred from the benefits of the pension laws solely for the reason that such officers and enlisted men were never actually enrolled and mustered into the service of the United States: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That any officer or enlisted man of a State military organization who rendered service of the character set forth in the foregoing preamble and who is disabled by reason of injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty while rendering such service, and the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of any such officers or enlisted men dying of such injury or disease, shall be entitled to the benefits of the provisions of the pension laws embodied in Title IV of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of the act approved June 27, 1890, entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," and of the amendments thereto, be, and the same are hereby, extended to such officers and enlisted men of the State military organizations referred to in the foregoing preamble who rendered service of the character therein set forth for a period of ninety days or more, and to their widows, minor children, and dependent parents.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of the act approved February 6, 1907, entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the civil war and the war with Mexico," be, and the same are hereby, extended to the officers and enlisted men of State military organizations who rendered service of the character set forth in the foregoing preamble for a period of ninety days or more.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe rules and regulations governing the character of evidence necessary to prove the service herein set forth: Provided, That a certificate of the adjutant-general of the State to which the military organizations belonged, showing the date of discharge therefrom, shall be accepted in lieu of the honorable discharge required by the provisions of the acts referred to in sections 2 and 3 of this act: And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the case of any officer or enlisted man in which the evidence discloses any fact that would have barred him from an honorable discharge had he been in the military service of the United States at the date of his discharge from such State military organization.

Mr. Chairman, this bill does not go as far as I think it ought to go, nor as far as Congress will, in my judgment, ultimately go; but my purpose in framing it was to limit its provisions to cases which differed from those which are now pensionable only by reason of the fact that these militiamen were never mustered into the service of the United States. In every pension law that Congress has enacted the primary consideration has been the service rendered the nation. That is what this bill is based on. It merely extends the provisions of the general pension laws embodied in Title IV of the Revised Statutes to cases in which wounds or injuries were received or diseases contracted while these militiamen were thus rendering service to the United States under the command of its officers, aiding in the suppression of the rebellion, and extends the provisions of the acts of June 27, 1890, and February 6, 1907, to the cases wherein such service was rendered for a period of at least ninety days. If any gentleman on this floor can offer a valid reason why such a law as this should not be enacted, I would like to know what that reason is.

There is nothing novel, Mr. Chairman, in the proposition to give these militiamen a pensionable status. On the contrary, the recognition of the service of the militia soldier is coincident with the Government of the United States itself. Our first President strongly urged that pension be granted to all classes of soldiers, no matter whether regular, volunteer, or militia, the only consideration being that actual and loyal service had been rendered against the common enemy. The act of April 10, 1806, provided pensions for all soldiers, including the militia, and the act of April 12, 1816, granted pensions to rangers, volunteers, militia, and sea fencibles called into service during the war of 1812. The acts of March 16, 1802, and of August 2, 1813, gave half pay to the widows and minor children of men who served in the militia, and the act of July 4, 1836, extended these provisions to the widows of soldiers and militiamen who had died subsequent to April 20, 1818.

Coming down to later days, we find that Congress, by the act of March 25, 1862, provided pay, bounty, and pension for the Missouri Home Guards; and still later, Congress, by the act of February 15, 1895, made the same provision for the Missouri State Militia and the Provisional State Militia.

There being abundant precedent for pensioning militiamen who rendered service to the United States, why not pension these who rendered such valuable service in the suppression of the rebellion? I can only account for the failure to do so thus far on the theory that some gentlemen are fearful that it will entail too great an expense upon the Government. I beg to state that such apprehension is not well founded. There were only a few thousand of the men who rendered this kind of service for a period of ninety days, and not many could prove service origin of their disabilities. Nearly half a century has passed since that time, and most of them have joined their comrades on the other side of the river. Only a remnant is left to which this bill will apply. It would not open the pension gates very much wider; it would not impose any considerable additional burden upon the United States Treasury. But even if it did, these men helped to defend and preserve the Union and to make it possible for us to be the great and powerful nation we are to-day. We can not be too liberal with them. Above all, it would be a just recognition of a class of men who have already been too long neglected. The saving of a few million dollars each year should not outweigh these considerations.

The distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], who has been pleading so eloquently here for the old veterans, called the attention of the House recently to the fact that over half of the $20,000,000 that will be expended annually under the act of February 6, 1907, will go to men who served ninety and one hundred days. Many of these were never in a battle and some of them never left the State in which they were enlisted.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I do not think the gentleman wants to go on record permanently with the statement that not half of the men who were enlisted for, and served, ninety or one hundred days, ever left the States in which they were enlisted.

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman from Michigan will permit me, what I said was that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD], in a recent speech in this House, made that statement. Personally I have never investigated the question far enough to be able to say on my own responsibility that what he said was true; but I recognize him as one of the distinguished representatives of the old veterans who has made a thorough investigation of the question, and I was simply quoting his statement. It seems to me that the time the statement was made by him on the floor was the time to challenge if it was not correct.

Mr. GARRETT. Is the gentleman sure that the gentleman from Ohio stated that? Are you stating it from hearing it or from the print?

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman from Ohio made the statement that approximately twelve of the $20,000,000 that will be expended annually under the act of February 6, 1907, will go to the ninety and one hundred day men.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That is it; did he?

Mr. LANGLEY. And then I said that many of these—I do not say the majority of them—I said many—were never in a battle and some never left the State in which they enlisted.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. I understood you to say half.

Mr. LANGLEY. I did not intend to say half. The gentleman from Ohio made the statement——

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. That was the point of my contention. I understood the gentleman to say that half of these soldiers never left their States.

Mr. LANGLEY. I said many of them did not.

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. It is clearly an error. The gentleman did not mean to be understood that way.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is right; I did not.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that it is a question about one-half or any part of these men to whom he referred that never left the State in which they enlisted.

Mr. LANGLEY. All I intended to say was——

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. As I understand it, it was not necessary to suppress the rebellion for many of the men who went into the Army to leave the State in which they were born and enlisted.

Mr. GARRETT. It took lots of them to do it.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. I understand that. I am a Pennsylvanian, and I know that it was necessary for lots of them to do it; but I do not understand that that is in controversy at all.

Mr. LANGLEY. The point I was endeavoring to impress upon the committee, Mr. Chairman, is that a great many men who are now on the pension rolls rendered less service in the suppression of the rebellion than did these militiamen of Kentucky, Missouri, and other States. [Applause.] And I ask, why is it that they are not given a pensionable status if that is true? Personally, I do not care whether my bill or some other bill is passed. Several gentlemen of this House have agreed to go with me before the Committee on Invalid Pensions at an early date to urge that justice be done these men. Heretofore bills of that character have been consigned to eternal sleep in the committee to which they have been referred. I want to say now, whether I remain a Member of this House for a short or for a long period of time, I shall never cease my efforts and my appeals in behalf of these brave and patriotic men in Kentucky and elsewhere who helped to defend and preserve the Union until some legislation is enacted in their behalf. [Applause.]

Now, there is another element of injustice, in my judgment, in our present pension system. I refer to that provision of law as a result of which certain soldiers and their widows, minor children, and dependent parents are denied the benefits of the pension laws because these soldiers had a prior Confederate service or had aided or abetted the rebellion. Gentlemen well know that in certain sections of the country there were a great many men who were conscripted into, or by force of circumstances enlisted in, the Confederate service when their hearts were not with the cause, and that there were others who, although at the time they aided or abetted the rebellion or enlisted in its service believed that they were right, afterwards decided that it was their duty to help defend the Union, and who therefore enlisted in the Union service as soon as they could; and it is also a well-known fact that in States like Kentucky, North Carolina, and others that I could mention men very often made efforts for months before they could get through the lines to enlist in the service of the Union. When these former Confederates did finally enlist in the Union Army they rendered good and faithful service from then to the close of the war or until they lost their lives or were sent home on account of disability resulting from such service. Section 4716 of the Revised Statutes prohibited the payment of pensions to such persons or to their widows, children, or heirs. By the acts of March 3, 1877, and of August 1, 1892, this bar was removed in cases where the soldier while in the service incurred disability from wounds or injury received or disease contracted in the line of duty. By the joint resolution of July 1, 1902, the bar was removed, except as to the cases of persons who did not enlist in the Union service until after January 1, 1865. There is no difference between the case of a former Confederate soldier who afterwards entered the Union service on December 31, 1864, and the one who did not do so until after January 1, 1865. There is no point at which the line can justly be drawn.

These men not only risked their lives upon the battlefield and endured all the hardships of Army service to aid the Union cause, but they took the additional risk of being subjected to extreme cruelties, and even of being executed, in the event of their capture by the Confederates. The ban of disloyalty because of having voluntarily engaged in or aided and abetted the rebellion has been removed from every other class of our citizens. The men who fought in the Mexican war and afterwards on the side of the Confederacy have been given a pensionable status, and the same has been done for those who served in the Indian wars and in the war with Spain. Then why retain the limitation fixed by the joint resolution of July 1, 1902? Doubtless it will be contended that it should be retained for the reason that those who enlisted in the Union Army after January 1, 1865, did so because they saw the Confederate cause was lost. But is it just that we should thus judge their motives? Besides, as a matter of fact, we know that there are hundreds of cases in which this was not true, and we know, too, that in States like Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, and North Carolina there were many men who were seeking an opportunity long before January 1, 1865, to get from the Confederate into the Federal lines, so as to enlist in the Union Army, but who, by reason of the conditions surrounding them, did not succeed in doing so until after that date.

These facts, Mr. Chairman, emphasize the injustice of the principle upon which section 4716 of the Revised Statutes was based, and I for one am in favor of purging our pension laws entirely of any provision which creates a bar to pension on that account. Speaking for my own State, I assert that there are now no more loyal, law-abiding citizens in it than the great mass of those who were on the side of the Confederacy. We in Kentucky have outlived the prejudices and passions of the war. We are a reunited people, all proud of our great State and working toward a common destiny, and I feel that I am speaking the unanimous sentiment of my people when I state that this blot upon our splendid system of pension laws should be wiped out. [Applause.] I have introduced a bill in this House for that purpose, and I hope to see it enacted into law.

There is still another class of former Confederates who afterwards served in the Union Army who are barred from the pension rolls, although they rendered, I contend, just as efficient and faithful service to the Union as did many who have a pensionable status. I refer to the "United States Volunteers," which consisted of the First, Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Regiments and the "First Independent Company."

It is a matter of history, with which gentlemen of the House are doubtless familiar, that most of the men of which these organizations were made up were deserters and refugees from the Confederate army and prisoners of war who had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States; that they enrolled themselves in the Union Army with the understanding that they were not to be sent to fight their former comrades in arms, among whom the great majority of them doubtless had relatives and friends; and that they were accordingly sent out for service on the frontier, although the records of the War Department show that a great many of them rendered other than frontier service after their enlistment in the Union Army. A number of these men were granted pensions pursuant to the construction which the Commissioner of Pensions placed upon the act of June 27, 1890, but this construction was afterwards reversed by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and, as a result, those who had been pensioned under the Commissioner's ruling were dropped from the rolls. The views of the Department, as a result of which these men are denied a pension under the act of June 27, 1890, and the act of February 6, 1907, are sufficiently indicated in the following quotation from the Assistant Secretary's decision of March 27, 1907, in the case of George W. Nelson:

It need not be argued at length that the purpose of releasing prisoners of war, of enlisting them "for frontier service," and of organizing them into regiments designated as United States Volunteer Infantry was not with the design of employing them against their former comrades in arms. The fact that such was not the purpose of their enlistment is as apparent as the historical fact that they were not thus utilized as military organizations, but were exclusively employed in the Far West, in operations against the Indians, in the guarding of stage and mail routes, and in the protection of property, private and Government—a service rendered while the war of the rebellion was in progress (or, at least, near the end of it), but in utter irrelevance to it; a service which the conditions then existing would have required even though the civil war had never been fought.

When title to pension depends upon service in a certain war, two things are to be considered in determining the pensionable character of service—the purpose of enlistment and the nature of the service actually rendered. The latter, with few exceptions, is in pursuance of the former; indeed, it is of great probative force in determining the purpose of enlistment. When, therefore, it appears that a man enlisted "for frontier service" and was actually employed upon the frontier in a service entirely divorced, in character and in purpose, from the belligerent operations then in progress against a rebellious group of States—the "civil war" or the "war of the rebellion," by whichever term it may be or has been called—such a man can not be held to have rendered actual service in said civil war. And if title to pension depends upon service in said war, whether it be under the act of June 27, 1890, or the act of February 6, 1907, such a man has failed to show a pensionable status.

While these men did not take part directly in the suppression of the rebellion, they did render service in the United States Army during the war of the rebellion, and a character of service which, under the liberal construction that usually governs the administration of the pension laws, should be regarded as service in the suppression of the rebellion. If they had not rendered this frontier service, it would have been necessary to withdraw other regiments from the field for that purpose. I have had occasion to talk recently with several members of these regiments who reside in my district, and they have given me in detail the character of service they rendered, such as performing garrison duty, building forts, checking or suppressing Indian uprisings, guarding Government trains and wagons and telegraph lines, protecting the property of citizens and of the Government, and performing escort duty, protecting other Union troops in that locality, and so forth. Much of this service was just as essential to the success of the plans of the Union Army as was the service rendered by those operating directly against the enemy.

I do not think it just to exclude such cases from the provisions of the pension laws, and if the Department has correctly interpreted the language of the present law, which I seriously doubt, the law should be amended.

I have recently received a letter from an ex-Union soldier and former Confederate which gives point to what I have said, in that it shows the difficulties which some men who deserted the Confederate service in order to join the Union Army encountered in their efforts to do so, and illustrates the injustice of the limitations now embodied in the law. I will read a portion of this letter, substituting, for obvious reasons, fictitious names for those mentioned by the writer:

On January 3, 1865, one of the most cunning and daring mutinous plans ever concocted and carried to a successful termination that has happened in this, or in any other locality in this Southland, was committed. Nick Carter's novel writers could not do the story justice. It is a matter of history that there were Confederate prisons at Salisbury, Andersonville, and Columbia where Union prisoners were kept and from which some made their escape. As is known, there was a Third North Carolina Regiment in the Union Army which sent out recruiting officers. Thirty of these officers, from the prisons and also the regiments, were captured, and the jail at Asheville was full of them. Captain Smith, of an adjoining county and of Company C of that regiment, together with three or four other recruiting officers, were under sentence of death and were to be shot on January 5.

The rebel garrison at Asheville, under General Palmer, was about 1,000 strong. Early in December, 1864, one William Jones, of the Second North Carolina Regiment, who was our hero, came back and joined the Confederate forces where he knew men and had kinsfolk as noncommissioned officers, with whom he conspired to release the prisoners who were in the jail and stockade, and they were to make their way direct as they could to Knoxville, Tenn., where the Third North Carolina was to be completed. Three hundred of the garrison agreed to Jones's plan. They were all to arm themselves with the best guns and plenty of ammunition and provisions—January 3, 12 o'clock midnight—and meet at Smith's bridge over the French Broad River. B. F. Brown, Thomas Brown, Sam Roberts, Jim Brown, and some others of the conspirators were so arranged that they fell on the guard at the jail and prison stockade, while still others were put on picket post at the bridge. These guards swapped places with other guards, and at a given time the jail doors were opened, likewise the stockade prison; consequently, over 100 Union soldiers smelled fresh air for the first time in a good while. At the time appointed 300 Confederates with 100 prisoners were on the road to Knoxville. They were followed next day by rebels and overtaken 18 miles from Asheville, in the Spring Creek Mountains, where they fought all the afternoon, when several were killed, some wounded, some captured. The balance made their escape, finally reaching Knoxville, where some joined the Third North Carolina, some other regiments, just whichever regiment they hit first. Jones enlisted these men in December, 1864, but their enlistments were counted from the time their names went on the rolls, subsequent to January 1. Some of these scattered soldiers did not reach their regiments till probably March; others were taken by our men as prisoners and sent west of the Ohio River against their protests. Now, these men, who probably served four, five, or six months, are barred from a pension because their names did not go on the Union rolls until after January 1, 1865.

A similar scheme was laid by Anton Fritz, Bill Fritz, Harry Rogers, and twenty more of the garrison at Hendersonville, N. C., who dropped behind on a march, hit the woods, rushed ahead of the rebel troops who were on a raid for Union men, and gave battle to Gen. Bail Edney, killed him and others of his troops, and made their escape across the lines to join the Second and Third North Carolina, only to be taken by our men and sent across the Ohio River after being sworn into the service by John Rogers, who was a regular recruiting officer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how can it be contended that any of the men who participated in these daring exploits, and who subsequently served in the Union Army, no matter where, have not an equitable title to pension?

There is still another class of soldiers who are unjustly denied a pension. I refer to those who are charged with desertion because of their failure to return to their commands, when as a matter of fact they had no more intention of deserting than had the bravest and most patriotic soldier of the Union. They can not have the charge removed under existing law, because the conditions upon which this law authorizes that action do not exist in their cases. Scores of cases have come to my personal attention wherein the soldier was sent on detached duty on verbal orders not recorded, or was granted a furlough, and was prevented by illness from returning to his command, or was cut off by the enemy or surrounded by other conditions which made it impossible for him to return; and I know of some cases in which they were prevented from returning by reason of their capture and confinement in rebel prisons. And yet they were charged with desertion, which charge still stands against them. Now, when they apply for the removal of the charge, they are met with an impossible requirement—proof that their failure to return was due to disability contracted in the service and line of duty.

It may be suggested that instead of amending the law relief should be had in such cases by special act; but gentlemen who have undertaken this know that it has been impossible for several years to get Congress to pass such an act. What Congress ought to do is to amend the law so as to empower the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion when it is satisfactorily shown that the soldier was unable, from any reasonable cause, to return to his command and be discharged. The charge of desertion is a very grave one and should not be retained upon the record against any soldier except upon proof most positive that it was justly made. I do not contend that the record made at the time by those charged with that duty should be lightly cast aside; but it is a fact which can not be refuted that the charge was often too carelessly made, and sometimes wholly without justification. If the laws governing the removal of the charge of desertion were amended so as to give the soldier the benefit of the reasonable doubt that is given in cases of offenses less serious than that of desertion, and if these laws were then construed according to the rules applicable to penal statutes, it would result in giving a pensionable status to many hundreds who are now unjustly deprived of it.

Thus far, Mr. Chairman, I have confined myself to a discussion of some of the elements of injustice which, in my judgment, based upon a careful study of and long experience in the administration of the pension laws, still exist in those laws.

I beg the indulgence of the committee now for a few moments while I advocate a more liberal pension law for all of the old soldiers.

The gentleman from Ohio [General SHERWOOD] has been advocating the passage of a bill which he introduced, providing that all soldiers of the civil war who served eighteen months at the front shall have a dollar a day pension. I am willing to go even further than that. I have introduced a bill providing that all who served ninety days in the suppression of the rebellion, including militiamen, shall have that rate of pension. Indeed, I would be glad to see the period of service required fixed at even less than ninety days. Suppose it would increase for the time being the annual appropriation for pensions. Are not the men who helped to save this Union entitled to the most liberal treatment at our hands? It is our duty to provide a rate of pension which will be sufficient to keep them comfortable and relieve them of the necessity of performing manual labor in their old age.

In view of the fact that there appeared to be so much opposition to giving all veterans a dollar a day, I introduced another bill, which is now before the Committee on Invalid Pensions and which fixes the rates as follows:

Fifteen dollars per month at 60 years of age;
Twenty dollars per month at 65 years of age;
Twenty-five dollars per month at 70 years of age; and
One dollar a day at 75 years of age.

While I would prefer that they should all get as much as a dollar a day, this bill would be much better than the present law, under which the great majority of them can only receive $12 per month, for the reason that they have not yet reached the age of 70 years, at which time they will be entitled to the fifteen-dollar rate. Twelve dollars a month! What does that mean? It means 40 cents a day—less than a great many of you pay for your luncheon—and yet you expect the old veterans with their disabilities, finding powerful allies in the infirmities of age; to support, clothe, and feed themselves and families upon this pittance. I for one am in favor of making our pension laws more liberal for the old veterans, whether they served eighteen months at the front or a less period of time.

I would not seek to detract in the least from the credit due the men who rendered the longer periods of service, but I think we have reached the point where we can afford to waive that question. I am sure that no veteran whose case is covered by this eighteen months' service bill would begrudge a single dollar that would be paid to those who rendered the shorter periods of service if they were allowed the same rate of pension.

I am also in favor of making an extra allowance to those who, in addition to undergoing the hardships of Army life, had to endure the suffering and horrors attending confinement in rebel prisons. I have introduced a bill for that purpose. The enactment of this bill would not involve the expenditure of a very considerable amount of money, and I am still hopeful that some measure of this kind will be passed. The bill reads as follows:

[H. R. 16094, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

A bill for the benefit of Federal soldiers and State militiamen who were confined in Confederate military prisons during the war of the rebellion.

Be it enacted, etc., That any Federal soldier, or any member of a State militia organization cooperating with Federal troops, who, while engaged in the suppression of the rebellion, was captured by the enemy and confined in any Confederate military prison, shall be paid the sum of $2 for each day he was so confined in such prison; and in case of his death the payment shall be made to his widow if she has not remarried.

SEC. 2. That the Auditor for the War Department be, and he is hereby, directed to carry out the provisions of this act under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

I also desire to place myself on record as favoring still more liberal pension laws for the benefit of the soldiers and sailors of the Spanish-American war, and I would gladly avail myself of an opportunity to vote for a bill extending to them the benefits of the act of June 27, 1890, so that those who are unable to earn a support by manual labor could receive a pension, even though they could not prove that their disabilities were contracted in the service.

Gentlemen who view with alarm any suggestion of an increase in our pension appropriation should remember that, so far at least as it relates to the veterans of the civil war, it would only be a temporary increase.

I will insert in the RECORD the following table, showing not only the different classes of pensioners on the rolls, but, what is more to the purpose, the havoc that the Great Reaper is making in the ranks of the pensioners each year:

Net loss, 18,600.

This table I want to supplement by the statement that during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, there was a decrease in the pension roll by death of 45,768. These figures are taken from the annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions. It is an entirely reasonable estimate that of this number not less than 40,000 were invalids, and most of these invalids of the civil war. The total number of pensioners on the roll at the expiration of the last fiscal year was, as you will note, 967,301, and the total number of invalids of the civil war on the roll at the same time was 528,099. If the total decrease by death be placed at an average of 30,000 a year only, which is a very conservative estimate, we shall have reached the end of that part of our pension list in less than twenty years.

These old veterans who fought for the Union are rapidly passing away. Three years from now a half century will have elapsed since the war in which they served began. It will be only a little while at the best that we shall be honored with their presence. With them the sun of life is fast sinking in the west. The hand of time bears heavier and heavier upon them as with feeble steps they approach the end. Would that I could have inscribed on the headstone that marks every old veteran's grave O'Hara's beautiful tribute to Kentucky's pioneers:

Rest on, embalmed and sainted dead!
Dear as the blood ye gave;
No impious footsteps here shall tread
The herbage of your grave;
Nor shall your glory be forgot
While fame her record keeps,
Or honor points the hallowed spot
Where valor proudly sleeps.

Yon marble minstrel's voiceless stone,
In deathless song shall tell,
When many a vanished year hath flown,
The story how ye fell;
Nor wreck, nor change, nor winter's blight,
Nor time's remorseless doom,
Can dim one ray of holy light
That gilds your glorious tomb.

Let us, while we have the opportunity, make the evening of their lives as comfortable, contented, and happy as a nation's bounty and gratitude can make it, that they may realize before they go that we appreciate to the fullest the priceless heritage they are leaving to us. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, from the beginning of time, in the language of the Bible, there have been "wars and rumors of wars." Some great names adorn the pages of the world's military achievements. Alexander the Great had conquered with force of arms the world of his time while he was yet a young man. Julius Cæsar spread glory upon the banners of Rome by such splendid generalship as the world has seldom seen. Napoleon brought modern Europe to his feet with the might of his irresistible sword until his weapon was forever broken at Waterloo. [Applause.]

America has furnished some names that stand high in the record of martial accomplishments. Frederick the Great said that the operations of Washington in the Revolutionary war in his campaign of six weeks about Trenton were among the most glorious in the annals of military history. In our second war with Great Britain Commodore Perry cut down trees that grew along the shores of Lake Erie and in a few days made a fleet with which he conquered the enemy in one of the greatest naval battles of the world. In the civil war the first fight in the world between iron ships was fought at Hampton Roads in Virginia. This battle heralded an era in the naval warfare of the world and marked the end of wooden vessels of war. And to America therefore the world owes the modern battle ship of steel. [Applause.]

Although our civil war forms now a dark chapter in our national history, one that we all deplore, it nevertheless served to bring out some bright lights in the galaxy of military heroes. Grant, the silent, stolid, irresistible on the one hand, and Lee, the beneficent, gentle, farseeing on the other, form a pair of generals that compare favorably with any of the great military commanders of history. And, again, the determined perseverance of Sherman in the North and the dashing bravery and at the same time the deep religious piety of Stonewall Jackson in the South add more luster to the triumphs of American military prowess.

But not to our generals alone is glory. The privates in the ranks—the men who marched with knapsack and musket—who endured the hardships of pestilence and hunger, who slept at night on the ground for a bed and with the canopy of the sky for a covering, who listened breathless for the sullen tramp of a midnight foe, whether they fought in the armies of the North or cast their lot with the fortunes of the South, are as brave as any soldiers who ever exposed themselves to the horrors of warfare. Tennyson asks of the English soldiery at Balaklava—

When can their glory fade?

But the glory of our American soldiers in the army of the North and in the army of the South is as enduring as the glory of the soldiers that the great poet has immortalized. And the battles of Shiloh and Cold Harbor and Gettysburg and the other mighty conflicts of the civil war gave birth to deeds as brave as any that occurred in the campaigns of the Greeks, the Romans, or the English. [Applause.]

We of Illinois feel a pardonable pride in the part our great State played in the tremendous days of the civil war. The great heart of Lincoln was nurtured on the wide and fertile prairies of Illinois. And to the actual ranks of the fighters Illinois gave Grant and that great volunteer soldier John A. Logan, besides the thousands of soldiers in the private ranks who fought as nobly and as bravely as ever soldiers fought. So, out in Illinois, we sing with a thrill of patriotic pride and recollection—

Not without thy wondrous story,
Illinois, Illinois,
Can be writ the nation's glory,
Illinois, Illinois.
On the record of thy years
Abram Lincoln's name appears,
Grant and Logan and our tears,
Illinois, Illinois.

[Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is true, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] has said, that this is the largest appropriation ever made by Congress for pensions. Yet I think there has been more need for larger appropriation than ever before. It is now more than forty years since the war closed, and these men are now all old and unable to engage in the active business of life, unable to perform any manual labor. Many of them have been crippled and diseased since they served in that great war and have been unable to accumulate much property, so that now they are unable to live comfortably unless the Government does help them with larger pensions, so as to furnish them with the necessaries of life. I do not think that it is right that these men should be left without means of support in their declining years. Many of them are now gone and those who remain stand with one foot in the grave and soon the last shot will be fired over the last grave.

Let us not forget these men who did so much for our country. It is all right to erect beautiful marble shafts pointing heavenward to the memory of these brave soldiers, but let us first provide for their comfort while living. It has been the policy of all governments to care for its defenders, and we should not forget ours. These men were not trained soldiers, but volunteered to do what they believed to be right and for the interest of the whole country. While I would not detract one iota from the regular soldiers who were thoroughly trained and prepared for war, still it has been necessary to depend largely on the volunteer soldiers in time of need. I shall not discuss the cause of that great war, for it indeed was great. Our soldiers went into the South and there met those of their own kind, just as brave and as firmly convinced that they were right, fighting for what they thought was best. But there are none there now, I believe, who are not satisfied with the result. If it should be necessary to call for volunteers again, I am sure no more loyal men could be found than are now in the South. We are indeed a united country and the flag of the Union is to-day honored all over this country of ours alike. [Applause.]

A man in his declining years with a faithful, hard-working wife, in many instances being too poor to own his own home, and compelled to pay rent for the house in which they live, many of them so afflicted as to be compelled to have the assistance of another person to attend to their wants, can not live on the small pension they receive. I hope we will not forget the needs of this class of men and will give heed to their just needs.

Many of these soldiers never applied for a pension until they were too old to longer work to support themselves, so that now they can not secure proof of disability due to service. These men should not be placed in the attitude of begging, but should be taken care of as a matter of duty of our Government. I am sure out of the abundance of our country we can well afford to look after these men in their old age. [Applause.]

Early in this session I introduced two bills having for their object the increasing of soldiers' pensions. One providing for paying all soldiers who had served sixty days and were honorably discharged a pension of not less than $30 per month. The other was an amendment to the act of February 6, 1907, so as to pay all soldiers who had arrived at the age of 62 years $12 per month; those 65, $15 per month; those 70, $20 per month; those 75, $25 per month, and those 80, $30 per month. The act of February 6, 1907, was a step in the right direction, but, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, it did not go far enough. I had hoped that Congress might pass this amendment if it was not thought best to pass the one paying $30 per month.

The Pension Office is compelled to follow the law, and in the course of its execution has to be more or less technical, so, as a result, they are compelled to reject claims that ought to be passed.

In my judgment the present administration of the Pension Office is one of the best and most liberal ever had in all its history. I believe it is the desire to give as liberal a construction of the law as is possible in adjudicating the claims of soldiers, and yet it is necessary many times, I have no doubt, to refuse pensions to men who ought to receive either an original pension or increase of one already allowed. If any fault is to be found, it is not with the administration of the office, but that it is necessary to follow the law, which does not permit a more liberal construction.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that this Government has been liberal to its soldiers of all wars, and the vast sum that has been appropriated from year to year has gone to relieve some veteran or his widow and children. I am sure that none of us regret that this money has been spent for this purpose. If such large appropriations must be continued for some years to come in order to relieve their wants and furnish them some comfort, I think it our duty to still do what we can for them. I hope that before this Congress adjourns there may be some more liberal law passed in the interest of the soldiers. [Loud applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss a question of a partisan nature, but I want to call attention to a bill which I have introduced in this House and to present reasons as best I can showing the justice and necessity of such legislation.

This bill provides for the removal of certain restrictions upon the alienation of Indian lands in Oklahoma, and it shall be my purpose to show to this committee that these restrictions have proven in the past a constant and successful barrier to the progress and development of our State, a menace to the civilization and advancement of the Indian, and destructive of the very spirit of American liberty.

I do not rise for the purpose of criticising the acts of any man who has had to do with Indian affairs in the past. I have the highest regard for that able man who stands at the head of the House Committee on Indian Affairs, although I differ from him politically.

That mistakes have been made in handling the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in our State no one will dare gainsay. It is but human to err, and it is but natural that mistakes should have been made in settling conditions so anomalous as ours. So far as I am concerned, I am going to be generous enough to ascribe the cause of these mistakes to a misconception of the situation and to attribute such misunderstanding of the conditions to the dense and prolix complexities of the state of affairs with which these gentlemen were confronted.

I fully comprehend the many disadvantages that confront one in securing favorable consideration of a measure introduced by a minority Member. Without going into a discussion of the rules of the House, I will simply say that I understand it to be the policy of the majority to assume all responsibility for legislation, no matter which party is in power.

My remarks, however, should apply with equal force to a bill introduced by my colleague [Mr. MCGUIRE], and I want to say just a word in regard to his bill. The McGuire bill is good enough, so far as it goes, but, in my opinion, it falls short of the legislation needed in Oklahoma to-day.

This bill must not be regarded as embodying the exact ideas of the Oklahoma delegation. It smacks too much of paternalism for that. This measure should be regarded as representing the limit to which the Interior Department would agree to go at this time. It is the result of an agreement with that Department gives a great measure of relief, and for these reasons I shall give it my unqualified support, in the hope that if my bill fails, then the removal of restrictions provided for by the McGuire bill will prove so satisfactory that there will be no objection to adopting the provisions of my bill at an early day.

PRESENT CONDITIONS.

Of one thing I am morally certain, and that is this, If the gentlemen on the floor of this House only had a thorough understanding of the conditions in Oklahoma, if they could only see these conditions in their true light and as they really exist, there would be no occasion for the presentation of my remarks to-day, for I feel sure you would pass the bill which I have presented without opposition and with very little comment.

As you all know, we have a new State out there. Our predicament was deplorable enough before our admission, but with the advent of statehood and the many burdens that come therewith, the conditions on the east side of that State, in what has heretofore been known as Indian Territory, will soon become almost intolerable.

All the lands in Indian Territory originally belonged to the Indians composing the Five Civilized Tribes and were inalienable and nontaxable. Indians, I say, Mr. Chairman. As a matter of fact, they are not real Indians as you understand that term. A great majority of them are mixed-blood Indians, with a small degree of Indian blood. Others, white men who have intermarried into the tribe, and a great number, about 15,000 as I remember, are negroes, freedmen, former slaves of these tribes, who have had lands allotted to them, so that the actual Indian, the real full-blood Indian, only represents a very small minority of these people. But, getting back to the land question, I will say that there are about twenty million acres of these lands, all inalienable and all nontaxable. To be more accurate, restrictions have been removed on about three million acres of these lands, leaving a residue not of twenty million, but of seventeen million acres on that side of the State, all nontaxable, and on which permanent improvements and home building are absolutely prevented, for the reason that title can not be made on account of these restrictions.

Such lands as have had restrictions removed are distributed over many of the counties on the east side, but I understand that in some of the counties no restrictions whatever have been removed. All of the land is inalienable and not one dollar in taxes can be realized from same.

The major portion of these lands have never been improved or put in cultivation, therefore produce no revenue whatever to anyone. Many of the Indians owning such lands have no funds with which to improve them, and the most inconsistent and ridiculous part of the whole system is that this very class of Indians, who are too poor to build improvements on their lands, are prevented from leasing these lands for a longer period than one year. Now, what I would like to have explained to me is how, in the name of common sense, such lands are ever to be made productive under the present system? The Indian without funds to improve his land is prevented from having it improved by leasing. So I think it can easily be understood how this very class of Indians which are incompetent must retrograde under the present law.

These conditions, of course, make our State a most undesirable abode for the man with a worthy ambition to build and own a home of his own.

Many of our best citizens have emigrated within the last eighteen months, pulled up bag and baggage, and left the State entirely. Why? For no other purpose than to seek a location where they can own a home and improve it.

Within the radius of the trade of my home town, Ardmore, I understand that 50,000 acres of land which had formerly been in cultivation, lay out and produced no crops whatever last year. Every town and every commercial interest in our State has felt the baleful influence of these restrictions, and the Indian himself is the worst discommoded of all.

Our State is in its infancy. It is in the formative period, when it needs to draw upon every resource and every fiber at its command. We have no public, State, or county buildings on that side of the State. No court-houses, no jails, no schoolhouses, and no improved roads. As a matter of fact, outside of the towns you can not even acquire title on which to build schoolhouses under the present law. My bill will remedy all of these conditions completely, while that of my colleague will ameliorate conditions, to a large extent, though not giving complete relief.

Now, mind you, Mr. Chairman, not a member of the Oklahoma delegation asks that the full-blood Indian be molested in his last home, but we do ask that such Indians as are civilized and competent be allowed to manage their own affairs without interference from the Federal Government, and that the progress of our State be not further retarded by such senseless restrictions on the acts of intelligent people.

HISTORY.

In order to thoroughly understand the unfairness and the creation of these unjust inhibitions on the rights of my civilized fellow-tribesmen, it will be necessary to go back a few years and recount briefly the history of these erstwhile wards of Uncle Sam.

By way of explanation, I wish to say that the word "civilized" in the term "Five Civilized Tribes" is by no means a hollow and meaningless expression. The Indians composing these tribes have been subjected to the beneficent influence of Anglo-Saxon civilization for centuries, by education, by religion, by intermarriage, and by all other means of direct association with the whites.

This very term, "Five Civilized Tribes," has been applied to these people for four generations, and for eighty years they have had regular constitutional forms of government, fashioned after the Government of the United States, by which they enacted a regular civilized code of laws, protecting their respective citizens in their property rights and punishing infractions of law and order.

Their school systems, operated entirely by the tribal governments, were the most liberal of modern times. They had what they called "neighborhood schools," similar to district schools in many of the States, and high schools with a regular prescribed curriculum, the completion of which merited and exacted a diploma. Not only were tuition and books provided without cost to the pupils or parents, but board, laundry, and medical treatment as well, and, in some schools, particularly the orphan schools, clothing and all other necessities were furnished at no direct expense whatever to the beneficiaries.

So that the Five Civilized Tribes have come to be in deed and in fact civilized. This is a bold assertion, Mr. Chairman, but I make it without fear of contradiction. I dare say there is as small a degree of illiteracy among some of these tribes to-day as among a similar number of people in the city of Boston, the very hub of civilization on this continent. [Applause.]

These Indians became dissatisfied with their environments during the early part of the last century and made application to their Great White Father, Andrew Jackson, for a change. This illustrious old patriot bade his children seek a new home in the wilds of the boundless West.

After searching about over the entire Western country it is no wonder that these children of nature chose the beautiful Indian Territory, with its richly productive soil, its mild, equable climate, its clear, running, crystal waters, and bountiful supply of wild game, where, as many of them thought, they would pursue their worship of nature so long as grass grew and water ran. But the Indian was quick to see the possibility of development in his country. He was early to see the advantage of raising cotton, corn, wheat, and live stock, rather than lolling in idleness and depending upon the uncertainty of the chase for a livelihood. So he invited his paleface brother to come in and assist in the development of what he called his "Land of the Fair God."

The white man came on horseback and in the prairie schooner at first. Then came his railroads and other modern means of transportation, and finally the palefaces swarmed in upon us from all sides, bringing with them their up-to-date agricultural, mining, and other machinery, their religion, their education, and their civilization, until finally the clouds of ignorance and superstition which once hovered over these people have been almost entirely dispelled, and this same Indian stands to-day in a great many instances as the very highest exponent of American civilization [applause] clamoring to have all disabilities removed from his rights and liberties and to be given full-fledged American citizenship. [Applause.]

Mr. CHANEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHANEY]?

Mr. CARTER. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. CHANEY. I would like to ask the question if there has been an opinion expressed on the bill the gentleman has introduced, by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CARTER. He has agreed to the bill which has been introduced by my colleague.

Mr. CHANEY. Has he expressed an opinion in behalf of the gentleman's bill?

Mr. CARTER. He has not agreed to all the provisions of my bill.

Mr. CHANEY. I am very much interested in the gentleman's speech and interested, too, in seeing that these people have the largest possible liberty consistent with their protection; and does the gentleman tell the House that all the restrictions respecting the alienation of lands and all these matters relating to transactions between man and man could safely be removed, and that they would not be gobbled up by persons who would take advantage of them?

Mr. CARTER. No, sir; I do not pretend to tell the committee that all the full bloods are competent, but many of them are. I will come to that in a little while. My bill provides that the restrictions shall be removed from all lands except the full-blood Indian's homestead, but that his homestead shall remain inalienable for twenty years.

ATOKA AGREEMENT.

The Five Civilized Tribes had made such rapid strides in civilization in their new home, and their country had been developed and settled to such an extent that by the closing years of this same century it again became necessary to modify their conditions, so that beginning with the year 1898 certain agreements were entered into with these several tribes looking to a complete change of the Federal relation with these people. These agreements were negotiated by authorized tribal commissioners and a United States Commission, commonly known as the Dawes Commission. They required the ratification of Congress and a majority of the popular vote of the tribe before they became effective. These agreements provided for a dissolution of the tribal governments within eight years, allotment of lands in severalty, and speedy settlement of all tribal affairs.

Among other things certain restrictions were placed upon the alienation of Indian lands, the provision for such restrictions being practically the same in all of the different agreements. I will read the provision in what is known as the Atoka agreement, made with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, which will suffice to reveal the intent of all:

All the lands allotted shall be nontaxable while the title remains in the original allottee, but not to exceed twenty-one years from date of patent, and each allottee shall select from his allotment a homestead of 160 acres, for which he shall have a separate patent, and which shall be alienable for twenty-one years from date of patent. The provision shall also apply to the Choctaw and Chickasaw freedman to the extent of his allotment. Selections for homesteads for minors to be made as provided herein in case of allotment, and the remainder of the lands allotted to said members shall be alienable for a price to be actually paid, and to include no former indebtedness or obligation, one-fourth of said remainder in one year, one-fourth in three years, and the balance of said alienable lands in five years from the date of patent.

That all contracts looking to the sale or incumbrance in any of the land of an allottee, except the sale hereinbefore provided, shall be null and void. No allottee shall lease his allotment, or any portion thereof, for a longer period than five years, and then without the privilege of renewal. Every lease which is not evidenced by writing, setting out specifically the terms thereof, or which is not recorded in the clerk's office of the United States court for the district in which the land is located, within three months after the date of its execution, shall be void and the purchaser or lessee shall acquire no rights whatever to an entry or holding thereunder, and no such lease or any sale shall be valid as against the allottee unless providing to him a reasonable compensation for the land sold or leased.

This provision is well enough, perhaps, for incompetent persons, but its application is every day proving a detriment to such civilized Indians as compose the majority of the Five Civilized Tribes.

The Atoka agreement was defeated at the first Choctaw-Chickasaw election, many of the more advanced members of the tribes opposing it on account of this very restriction provision. Another election was called, however, the importance of an early change in conditions urged, and this time the agreement was ratified by a small majority, in the main because it was thought the spirit of such agreement would be carried out, giving us a "speedy settlement of tribal affairs," and these matters of restrictions on land titles and taxation could be adjudicated prior to the advent of statehood.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. In what way or by whom can these matters be determined as to whether they should have the privileges that you have said they should have?

Mr. CARTER. I do not believe I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. You say that under certain conditions they are to have the right of title. In one way you say it shall be done within five years and another within two years.

Mr. CARTER. I am coming to that in a minute. That law has all been changed.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I was only asking for information.

SUPPLEMENTAL AGREEMENT.

Mr. CARTER. Before the lapse of many years it was discovered that this Atoka agreement was inadequate and incompetent for the settlement of these affairs, and in 1902 another compact was entered into with the Choctaws and Chickasaws by the United States known as the "supplemental agreement." This supplemental agreement practically reiterated the retriction provision of the Atoka agreement, and the former procedure of enactment ensued. A strong fight was made against this agreement on account of this same restriction provision; but, as it gave to these tribes an opportunity to have expunged from their rolls certain persons whom they claimed had no rights, and provided for a per capita payment of a part of the tribal funds, it was ratified at the election.

ACT OF APRIL 26, 1906.

The conditions under these two agreements were most deplorable, but not to be compared to what was yet to be handed out to us by the act of April 26, 1906. Under these two agreements the Secretary of the Interior had not been prevented from removing restrictions on the alienation of lands other than homestead allotments, whenever, in his opinion, the Indian was considered competent to manage his affairs. So that one of these Indians, who had now come to be a sovereign citizen of the United States, supposedly with all the rights, privileges, and immunities attaching thereto, could, by debasing his manhood and pride to a degree of abject servility, by admitting his inferiority to other men, supplicate and beg the right to eat the bread which he possessed, and which was justly his to do with as he pleased.

This last act referred to not only denied a part of these people this small modicum of liberty, not only prevented them from presenting their humble request for the pursuit of their happiness as they saw it, not only declared that they should not be allowed to present their modest petition to have such restrictions removed when they were competent, but placed the additional inhibition on many that they could not even lease their land without truckling to some departmental official.

Now, this is not said in any spirit of antipathy or disrespect to any departmental official. I have the highest regard for many of those people. They are not to blame. The officials of no Department are to blame for this. The system is wrong, the law is wrong, and Congress alone has power to change that law.

But says some facetious Member, "CARTER, you have no kick coming. You may have your restrictions removed. Make your application, and the Secretary of the Interior would not dare refuse to remove your restrictions."

That is true as to a part of my lands only. What I want gentlemen of this committee to understand is that I and each member of my family have 160 acres of land which no power under heaven's canopy can give us authority to alienate except this Congress.

The Indian is very much of a human being. He is subject to all the impulses and foibles of other intelligent people, and, like any other intelligent man, he resents the idea of having to ask any man's permission to do as he desires with his own property. He can see no reason why he should be called upon to submit his plans to any man in order to get supervision over what is justly his, so he hesitates to ask the Secretary of the Interior to remove any supposed restrictions there may be upon his liberties as an American citizen.

Out West, Mr. Chairman, money is scarce and interest very high. Many times in the past have the individual financial interests of business men of Indian blood suffered for the want of cheap money, which is almost always available on such real estate security as this, and which they could easily have obtained but for the imposition of these restrictions. No man may attempt to prophesy what the vicissitudes of life will bring. We may even undergo greater privations in the future than in the past. We may even see the savings of a lifetime swept away for the want of a few dollars which could be obtained in this way; but it matters not what may transpire, let the very worst come to the worst, I for one shall never bend the knee to mortal man for any financial consideration. [Prolonged applause.] And the majority of them feel just as I do, sir.

Now, Mr. Chairman, do not misunderstand me. I know that we have grafters out there. I know that we have a few Indians who are incompetent, and I would not leave the last home of the full-blood Indian to the pitiless mercy of unscrupulous grafters. Far be it from that. No man has a more profound sympathy for these plain, artless people than I. No Member on the floor of this House feels more keenly his responsibility to them that I. Why! They elected me to Congress. But for the Indian vote I might not be a Member of this honorable body to-day, and they elected me upon the very platform that is embodied in my bill—removal of all restrictions upon the alienation of Indian lands, except the full-blood Indian's homestead. [Applause.]

Mr. CHANEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

Mr. CHANEY. I beg to ask the gentleman what his bill does more than the bill which has had the recommendation or assent of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. CARTER. The bill of my colleague [Mr. MCGUIRE] provides for the removal of restrictions on all people not of Indian blood; upon all people whose quantum of Indian blood is less than one-half; upon the surplus lands of all people whose quantum of Indian blood is one-half or more; but it does not touch the full-blood Indian's surplus, while my bill provides for the removal of all restrictions, except upon the full-blood Indian's homestead.

Mr. FLOYD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a statement right in that connection?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. FLOYD. As the gentleman is aware, I spent about two weeks in the Indian Territory last summer.

Mr. CARTER. I well recall that fact, and I think we were much benefited by the visit of the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FLOYD. I want to call the attention of the House to two or three cases that were given to me by a prominent lawyer of Prior Creek. One was the case of a young lady who was a graduate of two literary institutions and also of the Conservatory of Music at Chicago. She could not dispose of her lands on account of this provision. Another case was one that appeals to the sympathy of every man, and that was this: A lady had three children; they were full bloods, and she had an allotment for herself and three children. This attorney told me that the land allotted to her was worth $50 an acre. She could not lease it on account of the restriction forbidding leasing. She could not sell it. She submitted a letter to her attorney, asking why it was that, with so much land, worth so much money, they could not get bread. The woman had to beg bread because the regulations prohibited her from selling her land or leasing it for more than one year to anybody. Nobody would undertake to go on and clear up those rich bottom lands, clear them of timber and put them in cultivation, on a one-year contract or an illegal contract.

This shows the far-reaching effect of these restriction laws. The first case mentioned restricts an Indian of the highest degree of education and intelligence, who is capable of managing her affairs as any other person. The second restricts a small ignorant class rich in lands and values, and by so doing keeps them in a condition of absolute poverty and want. The law is equally detrimental to both classes.

Mr. CARTER. That is true, and there are numerous instances of this kind. College graduates with one thirty-second Indian blood are subjected to these restrictions, and I know of a number of poor full-blood Indians who are incarcerated in the jails to-day in Oklahoma for minor offenses unable to make bond, yet owning an abundance of land which can not be hypothecated even at the price of their freedom. This restriction law respects neither intelligence nor want, and its wide scope reaches from the most intelligent mixed blood and white man, who resents dictation, to the helpless full blood impoverished by its application.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I will, with great pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. How many acres did the gentleman say was allotted and could not be disposed of?

Mr. CARTER. All of it is restricted by a later act, which I will get to very soon.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I thought the gentleman said he had a certain number of acres himself that he could not sell.

Mr. CARTER. I will explain that fully in just a moment.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I thought I caught a statement from the gentleman of the number of acres.

Mr. FULTON. I think I can explain that.

Mr. CARTER. I expected to explain that later in my remarks, but I yield to my colleague.

Mr. FULTON. I was simply going to say that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] said that he could have the restrictions removed on his surplus lands, consisting of 160 acres, by applying to the Secretary of the Interior, but his homestead of 160 acres he could not sell in any manner any more than a full blood.

Mr. CARTER. The people of Oklahoma are not antagonistic to the Indian. They have been the recipient of many favors at the hands of the Indian people, and they are appreciative of the fact. They are the neighbors and friends of the Indians, and they themselves would be the loudest in their protests if the incompetent full bloods were left unprotected. If a full-blood Indian or any other person becomes homeless, he becomes a pauper and thereby incurs an undesirable expense for his subsistence, not upon the Federal Government, but upon the State in which he resides. So, Mr. Chairman, I do not think you need to have any fear on that score. The people of Oklahoma do not want the restrictions of any incompetent men removed.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARTER. I have only a limited time, and am attempting to make a consecutive argument, but will gladly yield when my remarks are concluded, if I have any time left. The majority of the Indians composing the Five Civilized Tribes can no longer be considered a savage and uncivilized people. They are civilized. They are enlightened. They are educated to a high degree, and I dare say that the stranger in Oklahoma to-day would find great difficulty in distinguishing the mixed-blood Indian from the white man, as a rule. So we believe the time has certainly come when we must distinguish between the competent and the incompetent Indian, just as we do between such classes in all other nationalities.

FULL BLOODS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the full-blooded Indian is in reality the only real ward of the Federal Government, and my bill gives him ample protection. It provides that he may not sell his homestead allotment for twenty years, but that he may sell his surplus land and thereby procure funds with which to improve his homestead.

Under the provisions of my bill the Indian will receive a twofold benefit. In the first place, he will receive money with which to improve his homestead and make it productive. In the second place, when his surplus lands are sold, they will be sold to some home builder who will immediately begin the erection of his home and put his land in a high state of cultivation.

This land will lie adjacent to some full-blood Indian's homestead, and as this land is improved and put in a higher state of cultivation, just in that proportion will the full-blood Indian's homestead be increased in value, so that within a few years the full-blood Indian's homestead will be worth more than his entire allotment is to-day. This I believe to be the best protection ever offered to the full-blood Indian, for the reason that it gives him actual aid and assistance, while the present law simply strains at a purpose it fails to accomplish. It intimidates and prevents the honest home seeker from entering the market and paying a legitimate price for these lands, at the same time failing to prohibit the unscrupulous adventurer from getting possession of such lands and clouding the title to same for a merely nominal consideration.

Here is a point I want this committee to catch: The Indian in his primitive state was noted for an unwavering fidelity to his obligations. I can remember during my lifetime when an Indian's word was considered as good as his bond, but not so now. This system tends to destroy this, the most commendable feature of pristine Indian character, by plainly saying to the Indian, "Go sell your land and give a deed to it, then make application to have your act set aside, to be repossessed of your property, and upon the grounds of your incompetency we will sustain you in your dishonest contentions." Did you ever hear of such teaching to a simple, unsophisticated ward by its guardian? The Indian may be a little slow to get next to the white man's virtues, but he has abundant wit to catch on to his vices. [Laughter.]

Even the most ignorant full-blood Indian is by no means benefited by these restrictions. Much of the land allotted to the full-blood Indian is unimproved. These Indians, as a rule, are poor and have no funds with which to improve their lands. If they could only lease their lands, they might have them improved in that way, so that in a few years they would provide some kind of an income. Or better still, if they could only sell their surplus lands the proceeds of such sale might be applied to permanent improvements on their homestead, and I would not object to having my bill amended to that extent.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is one fundamental fact which we must not overlook in dealing with this proposition, and that is this: These Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes do not own their lands by the good graces of the Federal Government. They bought these lands and paid for them. These lands were accepted by them in lieu of much more valuable lands relinquished in the old Southern States. They had a fee-simple title to these lands for generations before allotment, the only reservation in the deed being that of escheat, which I presume would have operated without such provision in the deed. We have no moral right to prevent these people from using their property to the best advantage.

POVERTY.

The Choctaws and Chickasaws are reputed to be one of the wealthiest classes of people on the face of the earth, yet to-day, with all their boasted wealth, with all this glorious paternal supervision, many of the ignorant full-bloods among them can barely keep the wolf of starvation from the door, when as a matter of fact they are rich—but how? Rich in lands and moneys held out of their reach by the Federal Government.

"What profiteth a man if he owns the earth and yet starves to death?"

I tell you, Mr. Chairman, it is a crime to longer keep these people under such bondage. Many of them are growing old and will soon pass away; doubtless their condition of penury will hasten death. Then, in the name of humanity, nay, I will not make hypercritical appeals to your sentiment, but appeal to your fairness instead. In the name of that spirit of fairness which rests deep down in the bosom of every true-born American, let us see to it that these poor people are given an opportunity to enjoy the possession of some of their just rights before that dreaded reaper takes them to the great beyond. [Applause.]

TAXATION.

You have exempted the Indian's land from taxation, when the most casual glance into history will disclose the fact that it has always proven a mistake to exempt any certain class of people from taxation. It is a greater injustice to those exempted from this burden than it is to those burdened by such exemption.

History will show that such injustice as this has often led to cruel and wanton bloodshed. Whenever attempts have been made to exempt any certain class from taxation a prejudice has invariably sprung up against the exempted class by those who had to bear the burden, and this prejudice has been known to exist for years after the cause has been removed.

The only prejudice existing to-day against the Indian in Oklahoma is due to the fact that he will not contribute his part toward the support of the State. This prejudice is at present in its incipiency. As taxes become due and demands are made for payment it will grow and gather force, finally to the utter excommunication of the Indian politically, socially, and commercially.

To say the most of it, ownership of this world's goods is but transient and fleeting, while this prejudice would, I am sure, be permanent and enduring.

I had much rather have my child grow up moderate in means, yet efficiently educated and rich in the love and esteem of its neighbors, than that it should attain its majority lavish in wealth, but banished from its consorts into a small minority, to be scorned and despised, for a just cause, by its equals. [Prolonged applause.]

The Indian who has seriously considered this matter will have no word of protest against having his lands taxed. He must realize that this demand for an equalization of supporting the burden of the State is a just one, and for that reason can not be permanently withstood.

He would be short-sighted, indeed, if, simply for the purpose of saving a few paltry dollars taxation, he would allow a condition to exist which would create a prejudice not only detrimental to his own interests, but which would prove a menace to his children and his children's children.

The Indian expects all the burdens and benefits that come with your American citizenship. He will not object to paying his taxes if you will only make of him a citizen in fact as well as in name and eradicate these restrictions from his liberties.

The Indian believes, no matter what his political faith may be, in that eternal principle, "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." And should stand firmly upon the proposition that "the man who is unwilling to bear his just share of the burden of supporting his Government is unworthy to live under and enjoy the blessings of a great Government like ours." [Applause.]

PURPOSE OF INDIAN OFFICE.

Undoubtedly the purpose of the establishment of the Indian Bureau in the Interior Department was to eventually make of the Indian an independent and self-reliant citizen, and to this end I take it has the Indian Office ever labored, educating and instructing the Indian in literature, in agriculture, and in all the different branches that go to make our cosmopolitan American citizenship.

This paternalistic attitude is well enough for the full-blood Indian, who, as stated before, is the only real ward of the Government, but when an Indian or any other person reaches the point of intelligence at which he is competent to think and act for himself any further attempt to supply the demands of his life or stand sponsor for his acts simply stimulates the indolence in the nature of that individual and destroys such independent and initiative character as you have been able to construct.

The intelligent mixed-blood Indians of our tribes have unmistakably attained the object of Federal supervision, to wit—intelligent, self-reliant citizenship. What such educated Indians as these need is to be let alone. Let the Federal Government loosen its hold. Remove their restrictions; make them free; give them a show, and I guarantee they will make good as American citizens.

KICKING KICKAPOOS.

The Kickapoo land frauds recently unearthed have been cited and exploited as an argument against the removal of restrictions for the Five Civilized Tribes. Such acts of loot and plunder as seem to have been committed on these poor, ignorant people are most reprehensible and warrant rigid punishment under the law; but the argument that this circumstance is any reason for the retention of restrictions on the lands of intelligent Indians is the sheerest kind of sophistry.

These Kickapoos are Indians of the very lowest degree of civilization and mentality, uneducated, and almost savage in instinct. They sold their lands to move to Mexico, and the very fact that they wanted to leave a great country like this and go to Mexico or any other place ought to have been sufficient notice that the Kicking Kickapoos were incompetent.

But seriously and in fairness these people can no more be compared with the educated mixed-breed Choctaw, for instance, simply because they are both of American Indian stock, than can the most ignorant, dog-eating Igorrote be compared to the shrewd, aggressive Jap because they are both of Asiatic-Malay origin.

To sum up briefly, I said I believe the imposition of these restrictions, according to existing laws, bad for the Indian; bad for the State of Oklahoma, and contrary to the spirit of American liberty. It is bad for the mixed-breed Indian, because it hampers the independence of an intelligent man; prevents him from using his property to the best advantage; teaches him to lean upon another; teaches him to be a tax dodger, and destroys his self-reliance, which we will all agree is the most potent element contributing to the composition of untrammeled American manhood. It is bad for the uneducated full blood, because it strains at a goal it has failed to reach; teaches him duplicity and knavery, which crimes he is not given to in his primitive state; denies him the funds with which to improve his lands, and cheapens the price of his lands by limiting the market to adventurous purchasers only.

It is bad for the State of Oklahoma, because during the embryonic period of this young Commonwealth it takes from its tax sheets almost one-half of the lands, prevents legitimate dealing in land, prevents permanent improvements on lands, prevents home building, and builds up a system of tenantry the like of which American civilization has never seen before. It is contrary to the spirit of American liberty, because it places restrictions on the rights and acts of competent and intelligent people, sovereign citizens of the United States, who are not charged with the commission of any offense whatever against either law or morals.

Not being versed in the law, it would be presumptive in me to attempt to discuss the legality or constitutionality of this question before this body of eminent lawyers. I do, however, ask the indulgence of the committee in calling to its attention certain Supreme Court decisions which I believe affect, vitally, this question.

In the case of The Cherokee Nation v. The State of Georgia (5 Peters, p. 1) Chief Justice Marshall delivered an opinion which I understand to be the first legal definition of the term "Indian tribes." Mr. Marshall stated, in substance:

Indian tribes are not foreign states, but must be regarded as domestic, dependent aliens.

This Supreme Court decision is reenforced by numerous other opinions, some of which are Jones v. Mehan (175 U. S., p. 1), Eastern Band of Cherokees v. United States (112 U. S., p. 288).

If these tribes are domestic, dependent aliens, it would naturally follow that each constituent element thereof is a domestic, dependent alien. But United States citizenship was conferred on all members of the Five Civilized Tribes by the act of March

2, 1901. Now, it seems to me that the term "dependent alien" is absolutely incompatible with United States citizenship, therefore restrictions might be maintained upon the liberties of Indians who are domestic, dependent aliens, but not upon United States citizens, and in view of these citations, it seems to me a very close question if such restrictions can really be legally and constitutionally maintained.

But that matters not, granting for the sake of argument that such provision should be upheld by the court. Grant that this provision may not be a technical legal violation of the Federal Constitution. Nevertheless, I believe that to restrict an intelligent man in such a manner as this is morally violative of the spirit of that provision of the Constitution which guarantees life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness.

If I am a sovereign citizen of the United States, of sound mind, and competent to manage my own affairs, you have no more moral right to single me out and place specific restrictions on the disposition I shall make of my effects on account of my Indian blood than you have to restrict an Irishman in the wearing of the green on St. Patrick's Day on account of his Irish blood, and I do not think this House would want to attempt to regulate that—not the New York City Members, anyway. [Laughter.]

In conclusion, I want to say, if you will remove these restrictions, if you will give Oklahoma an equal start with all the other States at the time of their admission, we will give you a sample of progress of which the parent Government may well feel proud. Our country will be filled with home seekers, worthy constituents of many of these gentlemen, who will build homes and convert the rich virgin soil into blossoming fields of grain and cotton.

The worthy pioneer will then have an opportunity to realize the ambition of his life. Consider for a moment the American pioneer. Consider this sturdy, stout-hearted yeoman who has helped to develop this country and make it fit to live in; who has taken his life in his hands, as it were, and hewn from the great primeval forests of the West his modest home far in advance of law and order, thereby making possible the existence of all the great States west of the Alleghenies and contributing to the magnitude and grandeur of this stately Republic. [Applause.]

Is not this worthy citizen entitled to some consideration at the hands of the Government he has helped to build and make great? Why, think you, has this sturdy citizen braved all the dangers of frontier life? Why has he undergone all the privations of the early settler? For the just and righteous purpose that he and his beloved little family might secure some hearth and fireside, humble though it be, that they could call home. [Applause.] If you remove these restrictions you do no less than justice by all, yet you grant to this steadfast citizen a life which will have a new meaning. He will move from the humble hut where he has been forced to live and pay rent in the past and begin the erection of a new home, all his own, paying tribute to none save his country and Almighty God. [Loud applause.]

It shall be our utmost endeavor and highest ambition to give to the parent Government an example of unalloyed devotion and loyalty; if in the troublous times of war it should become necessary to call for good men, brave and true, to battle for the rights of this great Republic, you will find that no State in this Union will respond more willingly than the infant State of Oklahoma. [Loud applause.] None shall be permitted to rally around the Old Glory more graciously and more patriotically than the sons of the Indians, "Land of the Fair God;" and in the piping times of peace we will endeavor to contribute to the National Congress, honest, patriotic members always, who will dare to do the right as they see it, no matter what their political faith may be. [Loud general applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for its considerate attention.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. I do not see how this body can refuse to give the gentleman all that his bill proposes.

Mr. KEIFER. I yield one moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. I would ask what it is that the gentleman would have and that they think they require for Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. Then I will state, if I have the time, that if there is anything this House could do for Oklahoma, I am sure it will do it after the statements that have been presented by the gentleman from Oklahoma. [Applause.]

Mr. KEIFER. I now yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. HALL] one hour or such part thereof as he may desire.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to discuss a question which I consider of the most vital concern to every Member in the Chamber and to the country at large, surpassing in its importance, perhaps, even the currency question and many other questions prominent in the public eye. It is not without considerable hesitancy that I undertake the discussion of so important a subject before this body, composed as it is so largely of men of greater legislative experience and ability than myself; but, on the other hand, I am encouraged and assured by the knowledge that if the facts and arguments which I shall present possess any inherent merit, the ability and powers of discernment of my auditors are such that they will be able to grasp the ideas, notwithstanding the imperfect manner in which I may present them.

Mr. Chairman, the general subject of my remarks is the preservation and protection of one of our most important national resources, one of our most indispensable national resources, the timber supply. And in the course of my remarks in connection therewith I propose to suggest certain remedies, including the removal of the import duty on all kinds of lumber, upon wood pulp, and upon paper, and also the correction of certain well-known irregularities existing in the lumber and paper trade.

In the early days of the session I introduced a bill in this House for the purpose of placing lumber upon the free list and for removing all import duties now imposed by statute——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question right there?

Mr. HALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. What has become of that bill introduced by you to put lumber on the free list?

Mr. HALL. It was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the gentleman hope to get it out of that committee?

Mr. HALL. Yes; I am talking for that purpose now. [Laughter.] I am attempting to expedite it, perhaps.

A measure of that character is primarily essential for the purpose of affording relief to our already overburdened and fast-waning forests. In the second instance it is essential on account of its connection with and its bearing upon the lumber trade generally, as I shall hereafter show.

That there may be no misunderstanding, I will say that this bill is in no sense a free-trade measure; but, on the contrary, is in perfect accord and harmony with the Republican protective system, and is in the enforcement of announced Republican policies. Every Republican tariff act has contained a long list of articles on the free list. The Dingley Act contains a free list of some 238 articles and classes of articles.

The Republican protective tariff is so imposed that in the collection of the revenues for governmental purposes on imports it affords a proper measure of protection to American industries and American labor, so as to secure the domestic markets for the former and to furnish employment and preserve the standard of wages of the latter; but both the industries and the laborers employed in them are dependent upon the supply of raw material or resources. Hence, in the protection of the industries and labor of the country it sometimes becomes necessary in the first instance to look to the very foundation by protecting the resource from exhaustion, and in such case other means than the imposition of an import duty become necessary. It therefore follows that the full statement of the Republican doctrine of protection extends to resources as well as industries and labor, and in the logical order of their importance resources stand first because the industries and labor are dependent upon them.

Take, for example, the timber supply, which we all realize is so rapidly disappearing in this country. If it shall be exhausted, with it will fall not only the lumber industry, which is fourth in the order of importance in the United States, but also the hundreds and thousands of other woodworking industries and occupations that are dependent upon the timber supply for their operations—the carpenter and builder, the manufacturer of vehicles, cars, cooperage, veneering, the distillation of woods, and myriads of others which I will not undertake to enumerate. Suffice to say that they employ annually hundreds of millions of dollars in their capital and hundreds of thousands, if not millions, of laborers. These are all dependent upon the timber supply, and if it shall become exhausted, these industries must of necessity cease their operations and the laborers be discharged from employment. Such protection is as far removed from the doctrine of free trade as the North Pole is from the South Pole.

At the opening of this session of Congress we had a practical illustration that this measure is in full accord and harmony with Republican principles, when our fearless, farsighted, and forceful President, who is perhaps one of the best, if not the best, exponent of modern progressive Republicanism, in his first message to this Congress recommended that the tariff be removed from all products of the forest, including wood pulp. Mr. Chairman, it has ever been the policy of Republicans to protect all industries and all laborers in America, and in so doing the present danger of deforestation should be promptly met by appropriate laws.

Notwithstanding the fact that during the last seven years the timber production of Wisconsin has decreased over 30 per cent, she is still the third State in the Union in lumber production, and at the last session of her legislature, a Republican legislature, wisely foreseeing the rocks upon which they were drifting, and desiring to preserve the industries of lumbering and the wood manufacturing establishments within their boundaries, was passed a resolution, which I will read:

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we respectfully memorialize Congress to remove the tariff on lumber: And be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and also to the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from Wisconsin.

Mr. Chairman, the State from which I come is not a timber State. We are dependent for our supply of lumber upon other States which are more fortunately supplied. The people there have a vivid recollection of the hard times they experienced during the last Democratic Administration, and, as a natural consequence, the State is overwhelmingly Republican. At the last Republican State convention, held in 1906, one of the planks in the platform adopted recommends the removal of the tariff upon lumber, and to that proposition I stand pledged as a Republican.

A quarter of a century ago the respective doctrines of free trade and protection were in the experimental stage. Great Britain has been referred to by our Democratic brethren repeatedly as an example of the benefits of free trade, and they condemn the protective policies which were adopted in this country and in Germany. Since then we have had the opportunity to judge of the merits of these two respective policies, and, like other great economic principles, their merits have been discovered and proven by time and experience. In this country we have witnessed such progress and development as the fondest hopes of man could not anticipate. In Germany, while perhaps there has not been progress and development in so great a measure as in this country, yet that country has also prospered. The late Lord Playfair, who was chairman of ways and means and deputy speaker of the House of Commons in England from 1880 to 1883, expressed, in 1891, the following opinion of American fiscal policy:

If the Americans be right in principle, and if they be successful in practice, the whole policy of the United Kingdom is founded on a gigantic error, and must lead to our ruin as a commercial nation.

Concerning the outcome, I desire to now call to the stand a witness, not an American, not a German, but a distinguished English statesman, interested in the welfare and proud of the history of his own country, Sir Alfred Maloney, who, in the last issue of the North American Review, relates the experience of Great Britain under the free-trade policy and compares it with the experience of the United States and Germany under the protective system.

Until comparatively recently there has been no organization and little propaganda in favor of tariff reform, and until the late by-elections there has been no effort to educate the British masses on the subject which concerns not only their vital interests, but their actual right to existence. The free-trade doctrine, once firmly established, has operated like the fumes of some powerful narcotic, and England has drowsily slumbered while other countries have taken the opportunity to enrich themselves at her expense. * * * No one can maintain that the United States and the German Empire are not flourishing communities or that their financial system impedes the growth of industry. Yet the conditions of life in England do not differ so widely from theirs as to support the suggestion that what has tended to promote national prosperity in those countries would have a contrary effect in the British Isles. In the United States the standard of the industrial classes is much higher than in Great Britain, whether it be in wages, clothing, education, or housing accommodation. All this is the fruit of protection, and it accounts for the attraction of emigration, the stream of which impoverishes England while it enriches America. In poor old England competition between cheap foreign goods and domestic products and manufactures depreciates the value of labor and keeps on the border of starvation over 12,000,000 of the population.

Mr. Chairman, wherever there is a sufficient supply of raw material, then, of course, it is right and proper that a protective tariff should be imposed on all articles that can be manufactured in the United States, so as to afford a sufficient measure of protection to our industries and to secure to them the home market and to secure to laborers employment and sufficient wages. But where there is an insufficient supply of raw material then that rule does not obtain, and we must seek for such other and different measures as will have a tendency to preserve that supply.

The reproduction of trees, like other vegetable and animal life, is governed by the immutable laws of nature, which are less flexible than those of the Medes and Persians—by the same divine system which controls the planets in their unvarying and majestic courses in the heavens, a law which man may indeed conform to and take advantage of, but which he can not control or change. With the jaunty indifference of a fiddling Nero, the American people are witnessing the destruction, not only of a city, but of one of the most important and indispensable resources of the country.

Do we labor under the delusion, Mr. Chairman, have we become so intoxicated by the successes and bounties of the past as to imagine that we can successfully overturn the laws of nature and of nature's God? Are we laboring under the hallucination that as Cadmus sowed dragon's teeth in the ground and produced an armed body of men in a night, we, the American people, can sow seeds and raise a forest in a night? Have we so far forgotten our duty to ourselves, our posterity, and our country that we are going to sit here idly and permit our great resources, our timber supply, to fade away and be destroyed forever without protest? Mr. Chairman, we are consuming each year three times the annual growth of timber. We are treating the forests of this country as though they were a great cistern from which we can take three barrels of water a day, expecting the supply to last forever with an inflow of but one barrel a day. What we need is to so change our system concerning the timber supply and the forests of this country that they shall be as a flowing well, where the supply shall be equal to or in excess of the amount used at all times.

It is, indeed, a sad commentary upon the business sagacity of our country that we are thus violating one of the most fundamental business principles by not living within our income. The inevitable result under present conditions, unless we speedily change our course, will be the complete exhaustion of our forests. The restless energy and constructive genius of the Anglo-Saxon has worked a great transformation in this country in the last century. The marvelous development of this country, the result of that energy and of that genius, stands the marvel of all nations. His aggressiveness, however, is not only a potential constructive force, but a destructive one as well. With his ax he hews a way through the forest and with the product builds the homes, the schoolhouses, the factories, and temples of his God. But at the same time in his wake he is leaving a desolate wilderness of tangled underbrush and blackening stumps. He is a mighty builder in times of peace and a mighty destroyer in times of war. The results are being manifested more visibly, perhaps, on our timber supply than in any other resource that we have in this country. The first legislation for the purpose of establishing forest reserves was in 1891 under President Harrison's Administration, when by Congress the President was authorized to establish forest reserves, and President Harrison established the first one in the Yellowstone.

The first efforts along this line were subjected to criticism, and perhaps not unjustly so in some respects, because while these tracts were set apart, there were no provisions made for the protection of the trees; they were simply locked up and left to burn. But in 1897, during McKinley's Administration, another act was passed, which remedied these defects. Provisions were adopted whereby these forests could be used for grazing purposes, mining could also be carried on within their limits, and to a certain extent agricultural rights were recognized, and matured timber could be cut under proper restrictions. Some States, following the example furnished by the Government, and realizing the importance of the measure, have established State forest reserves, but the total area covered by forest reserves, State and national, is only one-fifth of the total timbered area in the United States, and the remaining four-fifths are owned privately. By the establishment of this nucleus of forest reserves we have made a start, but it comes too late, and something must be done to supplement the Forestry Bureau in its work. There is one man in particular to whom the people of this country owe a great debt of gratitude, and he is a man who, with untiring zeal and patient effort, has studiously directed his attention to the establishment of a scientific system of forestry in the United States, Mr. Gifford Pinchot, the Chief Forester. [Applause.]

Forestry was discussed two thousand years ago. It is nothing new. A résumé of the history of forestry would be interesting, but it would be tedious. I would, however, call your attention to a short extract in one of the circulars issued by the Forestry Department concerning the progress made in one country, Germany, under a forestry system.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from South Dakota yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HALL. I will; certainly.

Mr. RAINEY. Before the gentleman enters upon a discussion of that phase of the question I want to inquire of him, inasmuch as he seems to be fair about the matter, if he does not think, in promoting forest preservation, it would be a good plan to take the tariff off of lumber so that we can destroy the forests of some other country and preserve our own?

Mr. HALL. That, sir, is a proposition I will reach in a few moments. I agree that it is one of the things that is very essential, namely, that we should extend the area from which we derive our timber supply by removing all barriers against the introduction of foreign lumber into the United States.

Mr. RAINEY. The gentleman will do something to accomplish that when he joins with us in our fight for tariff revision, and not until he does.

Mr. HALL. My friend, I certainly appreciate your good will——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. HALL. Certainly.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Former experience teaches me that the gentlemen on that side will fight just as strong for an article produced in their respective States as they will on this side, even cotton.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Just one question. Seeing the gentleman from Connecticut on the floor induces me to ask the gentleman who is addressing the House if he does not think it is altogether a lost motion to be discussing the removal of the tariff from timber as long as the Ways and Means Committee is organized as at present? Does he not know that the committee will not report any bill looking to that end at this session of Congress, and does he not know that the Speaker will not recognize any gentleman to make a motion to discharge the committee from its consideration?

Mr. HALL. I am sorry the gentleman is so pessimistic in regard to the situation. I believe that it is the firm desire and purpose, both of Republicans and of Democrats, to uplift humanity generally; to build up our industries and institutions; to protect our resources, and to promote the general welfare, the point of divergence between the parties being the methods adopted to attain these ends. And I believe that those in authority have that degree of patriotism that they will perform their duties in such a manner as in their best judgment will accomplish these results. I have confidence in the patriotism of every officer and every committee in this representative body. I believe that the principles that underlie the bill which I am advocating are such as will appeal to any reasonable man, and that is why I introduced the bill and why I advocate the measure.

I started a few moments ago, for the purpose of illustration, to call attention to the success of forestry in Germany. That country, like other European countries one hundred and fifty years ago, becoming alarmed at the disappearance of her forests, resolved to establish a system of forestry, not only for the purpose of furnishing a continuous wood supply but also for the purpose of protecting agriculture and stream flow, and, quoting from a circular issued by the Bureau of Forestry:

> Under this management the growth of the forest, and consequently the amount cut, has risen sharply. In 1830 the yield was 20 cubic feet per acre; in 1865, 24 cubic feet; in 1890, 52 cubic feet, and in 1904, 65 cubic feet. In other words, Prussian forest management has multiplied the rate of production threefold in seventy-five years. * * * If we were everywhere practicing forestry with a resulting improvement equal to that made in Prussia, our forests would be growing as much as we use.

The financial returns in Prussia are now nearly ten times what they were sixty years ago, and they are increasing more rapidly than ever.

In Saxony the yield arose 55 per cent between 1820 and 1904, under forestry management, and is now 93 cubic feet per acre, greater even than that of the Prussian forests. The net yearly revenue is $5.30 per acre. The yearly expense is $3 per acre.

Compare this, if you please, with the income of and expenditure on forests in the United States. In 1905 to 1907 both our expenditure on the forests and our income from them was but a fraction of a cent per acre. The longer the policy has continued, however, the more nearly does the Forestry Department become self-sustaining, and as the years advance it will become a source of considerable profit.

The forests of Wurttemberg yield an annual net revenue of nearly $6 per acre, and in Germany to-day the forests are in better condition than ever before, and under the present system of management is it possible for the German foresters to say with absolute certainty that the high yield and large returns which the forests now give will be continued indefinitely into the future.

In summing up the opportunities and possibilities of the United States in comparison with foreign countries, the Forestry Bureau says, in the circular which I have mentioned:

> In comparison with foreign countries, the prospects for forestry in the United States are particularly bright for the following reasons:
> (1) We start with the assurance that success may certainly be attained.
> (2) We have few of the handicaps which have trammeled other countries. We have no ancient forest rights and usages with which to contend or troublesome property questions to settle.
> (3) The results which other lands have achieved by long struggle, often with bitter costs, are free to us to use as we wish. We have, it is true, our purely national and local forest questions, but the key to many of them is somewhere in the keeping of the countries which have achieved forestry.
> (4) In variety, combined with value, our forests are without a parallel in the world. They produce timber adapted to the greatest variety of uses, so that, except to meet shortage, importations of wood are unnecessary. Furthermore, transportation facilities enable us to make every forest region available. Thus, by specializing our forest management, each kind of forest may be made to yield the kind of material for which it is best adapted, and the wastes due to compulsory use of local supplies may be practically eliminated.

The preservation of the forests is essential, not only for the purpose of preserving the timber supply, but is important for the protection of agricultural interests as well. These forests on the mountains and the hilltops act as great conservators of moisture gathered from the rains and from the melting snows, like enormous natural sponges, gradually distributing the water on the lower-lying country, irrigating the fields below. Now, when these great natural sponges are destroyed, when the forests are cut and burned down, the result is that with every heavy rain and with the melting snow, the water comes down the mountain and hill sides in torrents with a precipitous rush, causing erosion of the soil and great destruction, and finding its way into the streams and rivers causes great loss of life and property in the floods which we have read so much about, especially in the last ten or twelve years. Consequently, for those interests the preservation of the forests is quite essential.

The manner in which the timber is disappearing is shown by a comparison between the amount of timber that is now being cut and the amount which was previously cut. Statistics show that from 1899 to 1906, as one region was cut out and another one invaded, the cut in Pennsylvania has decreased 30.2 per cent, in Minnesota 23.4 per cent, in Georgia 36.4 per cent, in Kentucky 23.4 per cent, and in Wisconsin 30.7 per cent. Now, that decrease in cut is not due to a lack of demand for lumber, but on account of the diminished supply. That is proven by the fact that during all this time the prices of lumber have been steadily advancing. Furthermore, the onslaught on the forests of the Pacific States is indicated by the fact that during these same seven years the cut has increased in California 83.7 per cent, in Oregon 118 per cent, and in Washington 201.5 per cent.

I have roamed through the forests on the Pacific coast and admired their grandeur. It did seem to me as if those forests were inexhaustible, with their great trees towering toward the heavens. The Pacific coast is unparalleled with its great trees, and I may incidentally remark that it is also famous for its big men that it sends to Congress. [Applause.] Everything is done by extremes on the Pacific coast, and yet, when we calmly consider the fact that the demand for lumber in the United States is something enormous, we can appreciate what effect it will have upon these apparently inexhaustible forests upon the Pacific coast. The estimated stumpage of the State of Washington is 195,000,000,000 board feet; of Oregon, 225,000,000,000 board feet; of California, 180,000,000,000 board feet; an aggregate of 600,000,000,000 board feet. The annual rate of consumption of timber in the United States for all purposes, lumber, railroad ties, telegraph and telephone poles, cooperage, etc., aggregates about one hundred and twenty to one hundred and twenty-five billion board feet per year. Now, at this rate of consumption, if the timber were all to be taken from any one of these three States which I have mentioned, Washington, Oregon, or California, the forests of any one of these States would not last two years; and combining all three of these States, confining the cut to them, it would be exhausted in five or six years.

It is estimated that the amount of standing timber in the United States is between fourteen hundred and two thousand billion feet, and that the annual growth is between thirty and forty billion feet. Assuming a stand of fourteen hundred billion feet, an annual growth of thirty billion feet, and consumption of one hundred and twenty billion feet, the forests will be exhausted in less than sixteen years.

Assuming a stand of two thousand billion feet, exhaustion will be completed in a little over twenty-two years.

Again, assuming for the purpose of the argument the highest estimate of stumpage, two thousand billion feet, the lowest estimate of consumption, one hundred billion feet, and the maximum annual growth, forty billion feet, we will exhaust the forests in thirty-three years.

Conservative estimates between these two extremes fix the life of our forests, under present conditions and at the present rate of consumption, at from twenty-five to thirty years, and we must remember that the increase in population and development of the country will increase the consumption of timber proportionately.

I was much interested in the résumé of the industries and advantages of the grand old State of Ohio, the noble men that she has produced, and their achievements in the history of our country, as given by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNON] in his remarks a few minutes ago. I want to call attention, however, to the fact that in the State of Ohio the hard-wood lumber manufacturing establishments are doomed to destruction unless something is done to preserve these supplies.

The hard-wood lumber production in Ohio was reduced over one-half between 1899 and 1906. The decrease in products between 1900 and 1905, according to census reports, amounted to $7,212,345, or 57.4 per cent, and the rank of the industry in the State fell from the fourth to the twentieth place. The number of employees fell from 10,689 to 6,442, or 40 per cent.

Also in Indiana during the same period the lumber industry fell from the third to the eighth place, the value of products decreasing 27.1 per cent, the number of wage-earners decreasing 42.6 per cent, and the wages paid decreasing 36.6 per cent.

It will be seen by the foregoing statement that the supply of hard wood, as well as soft wood, is rapidly diminishing, and the effects of its scarcity are being already felt. The hard-wood timber cut in the United States in 1899, according to the census, was over eight and one-half billion feet, the exact figures being 8,634,021,000 feet. In 1906 it had fallen to less than seven and one-half billion feet, the figures being 7,315,491,000 feet, a decrease of 15.3 per cent. This decrease took place during a period when American industries sprang forward at an unparalleled pace and while there was the strongest demand ever known for every class of structural material, the prices of hard-wood lumber advancing from 25 to 65 per cent, showing beyond any question that the decrease in the amount cut was due to diminished supply and not to lessened demand.

Together, Illinois, Ohio, and Indiana produced 25 per cent of the hard wood in 1899. In 1906 they produced only 14 per cent. Their many woodworking establishments, which are now hard pressed for supplies, will exhaust the remaining remnants of hard wood within their borders in a very few years.

To illustrate the disastrous effect which the exhaustion of the hard-wood timber supply will have on the country, I will allude, for example, to the State of Illinois. In that State, which is only second to New York in hard-wood manufacturing industries, as shown by the census, $148,115,805 was invested in hard-wood manufacturing industries in 1905, almost one-fifth of the total capital invested in manufacturing in the State. It employed, as shown by the census reports, 59,844 wage-earners and turned out in that year a product valued at $139,970,590. Exhaustion of the hard-wood supply assuredly means the loss of these industries to the State, and what is true in Illinois is likewise in a measure true in many other States.

Not until we pause and consider that our reproduction of forest trees is so sadly neglected that we cut each year three times the annual growth; not until we realize that each year 125,000,000,000 feet of lumber is cut, a cut which means over 10,000,000,000 feet a month, over 333,000,000 feet a day, and over 13,000,000 feet each of the twenty-four hours of the day; not until we remember that by our tariff laws we are keeping out reenforcements to protect our timber supply from exhaustion, do we begin to realize the appalling fact that the sands which number the hours of our forests are falling fast; that from the snow-clad hills of northern Minnesota to the sun-kissed shores of the Gulf, from the wave-beaten rocks of Maine to California's Golden Gate, the cold steel of the tree butcher's ax is ringing the death knell of our once proud American forest tree. [Applause.]

Having thus called attention to the urgent necessity for prompt action to preserve our timber supply, I will venture the suggestion of the remedies which I consider essential and which will, in a measure at least, relieve the situation.

In the first place, I would reenforce for the present our timber supply, which is so greatly inadequate, by removing all barriers against the introduction of foreign timber, repealing all import duties on the products of the forest, including lumber of all sizes and dimensions, wood pulp, and printing paper, and placing them on the free list. It is manifest that until we establish a system which shall furnish a sustaining supply of timber sufficient to meet our demands we must draw a part of our supply from abroad, and it is imperative at the present time that we give this relief to our overburdened forests immediately.

Second. The present wasteful method of cutting trees privately owned without regard to protection of young trees or from forest fires should be stopped, and a minimum size of trees that may be cut should be prescribed, and proper measures to prevent the destruction of young and growing timber should be enacted by the several States in the exercise of the police power.

Third. By the establishment of artificial forests by planting seeds and setting out young trees where they can be, but are not now grown, and State legislation encouraging the same.

Fourth. For the protection of the small lumberman and to furnish him a fair and open market, with equal rights to all, and for the protection of the consumer of timber products from monopolistic systems and prices, I recommend, last, but not least, the uprooting and vigorous prosecution of two iniquitous trusts now existing in the United States—the lumber trust and the paper trust.

Not by any one of these remedies alone, but by all of them combined, can we hope to prevent our forests from extinction.

While the total timbered area in the United States exceeds that of Canada, the amount of timber per capita in Canada is probably ten or fifteen times greater than our own, and with proper relations existing between the two countries the importation of lumber into the United States from Canada would prove of mutual benefit to both countries.

Under the treaty of 1854 with Canada, logs and lumber were placed on the free list. In 1866 this treaty was terminated and a duty of 20 per cent placed on imports. In 1870 the duty on logs was removed, and since that time all logs have been on the free list. In 1872 a specific tariff was placed upon lumber, amounting to $1 per thousand feet on whitewood, hemlock, and sycamore, and $2 on white pine and other varieties. The Canadian authorities then retaliated immediately by placing an export duty on logs, which practically shut off from the mills along the border on the American side the supply of material from Canada. In October, 1890, the McKinley tariff went into effect, reducing the duty on white pine lumber from $2 to $1, under a tacit agreement with the Canadian authorities that their export duty on logs be abolished. August 28, 1894, the Wilson tariff went into effect, placing lumber on the free list with logs, except cedar and other enumerated varieties of wood and all cabinet woods. July 24, 1897, the Dingley tariff act went into effect, imposing a duty of $2 per thousand feet on white lumber and $1 on sycamore, basswood, and whitewood, as originally imposed in 1872. This was followed as before by retaliatory legislation on the part of Canada, which has practically put a stop to importation of logs from that country into the United States.

The history of tariff legislation shows that while both logs and lumber were admitted free from Canada no export duties or other restrictions on exportation of logs were imposed by that government, but that on each occasion when a high tariff was placed on lumber the Canadian authorities immediately retaliated by stopping the exportation of logs.

I express, I believe, the prevailing sentiment and desire of this country when I say that our relations with Canada should be most cordial and that reciprocity and not retaliation should be the aim of each country toward the other. Our geographical proximity, our common language, descent and religion, our interdependence in commercial and industrial relations create ties which bind us more closely to Canada than to any other country or dependency. I believe that no laws other than the natural ones of supply and demand and of business competition will ultimately be necessary to regulate our commerce with each other. But it requires the meeting of the minds of two parties to form a contract, and until such a treaty is made as will bring about a consummation of this relation of comity it is naturally incumbent upon the lawmakers of each to protect the interests of their respective countries ex parte.

Therefore, until such time as a satisfactory agreement can be reached between the two governments I will suggest that it might be advisable for this Government to enact automatic retaliatory duties upon Canadian manufactured products similar to those now contained in our statutes with reference to lumber and paper, but at the same time repeal all import duties now provided by law against their introduction so long as the Canadian government will permit logs and wood pulp to be exported to this country free of export duty or other restrictions, and providing, on the other hand, that in the event of the maintenance of export duties or other restrictions by Canada upon the exportation of logs and wood pulp, the President, by proclamation, may retaliate by imposing an ad valorem duty upon the manufactured products imported from Canada.

One of the remedies which I suggested a while ago for perpetuating our forests is regulation by State law of the manner in which timber shall be cut—that is, that a minimum size of tree that may be cut shall be prescribed and suitable provisions made to preserve the young and growing timber. This is a subject which is clearly within the police powers of the States, the timber supply being a subject deeply affected by the public interest.

Another remedy which I suggested was the encouragement of tree planting. In the past the raising of artificial groves was encouraged by the timber-culture laws of the United States. In some States, including South Dakota, provisions have been made by statute for the exemption of real property from taxation for a certain period where trees are planted, cultivated, and grown. Much is also being accomplished toward the desired protection of the forests by public sentiment, stimulated by forestry associations, and a great work is being accomplished along this line by the American Forestry Association, of which Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, is president.

I shall now discuss these two great trusts I have just mentioned, which occupy a position between and prey upon the independent lumberman and the producer of raw material on the one hand and the purchasing public on the other, constituting disturbing factors in commercial and industrial affairs—the lumber trust and the paper trust. The similarity of their methods and the fact that both deal in the products of the forest justifies me in considering them together; but, previous to doing so, I desire to draw a distinction between those trusts which I consider inimical to social and industrial life from those helpful organizations of capital which tend to build up our industrial and commercial institutions and interests.

Present day commercial and industrial conditions undoubtedly require the combination of individual capital into corporations, that being a method more convenient and safer for the investor than a copartnership—and there may, indeed, be associations of corporations for lawful and legitimate purposes, for example, where by such combination the cost of production of the article manufactured is decreased or expenses reduced; but there is another class of combinations the real purpose of which (whatever its ostensible purpose may be) is to stifle competition and exact exorbitant prices in some line of business or commerce. In order to gratify their demands for large dividends on fictitious capital, the prices which they fix, not being regulated by the natural laws of supply and demand nor restrained by healthy competition, constitute a confiscation of the purchasing public's money without giving just compensation or equivalent. Such a trust is an engine of oppression, a producer of commercial and financial disturbance, a menace to society, and should not be tolerated. It is this class which I condemn.

The lumber trust is probably the most thoroughly intrenched, well-organized, and subtle institution of its kind in the country, and its power is felt and its tribute levied throughout the length and breadth of the land. Its malevolent influences not only extend to the purchaser, but also to the independent lumberman. There are several so-called "lumbermen's associations" in the United States, each having jurisdiction over certain prescribed territory, and all of which act in concert, having one common head. This is the lumber trust, and it is within the power of a coterie of men, whom you can count on the fingers of one hand, not only to fix the prices at which lumber shall be sold at retail, but also to prescribe to whom the small lumberman may sell his product. As the distiller of petroleum, having a monopoly of the trade, can dictate the price of the raw oil to the producer and also the price of the refined oil to the purchaser, so this lumber trust thrives as an intermediary in the lumber trade, depriving the small lumberman of a fair market and exacting an exorbitant price from the consumer.

The methods of these associations are autocratic in the extreme. They issue periodical confidential blacklists to what they term the "regular" trade—that is, to the lumber dealers in and controlled by the trust, both wholesalers and retailers—giving a list of those who violate the ironclad rules which the association or trust lays down. The retail dealer is warned against buying lumber from a proscribed lumberman who sells his lumber to others than the so-called regular dealers; and, on the other hand, the lumberman who has the audacity to sell to any person or retailer other than the regular retailers in the trust is blacklisted if he continues that practice and warned that he must sell only to the regulars. An instance of the exercise of the power of this trust to prevent independent selling and buying was called to my attention last summer by a gentleman who while in northern Minnesota had made arrangements with the proprietor of a small sawmill for the purchase of a carload of lumber to be shipped later. Some time afterwards the car was shipped and he received his bill of lading. After waiting a reasonable length of time and the car not arriving, he attempted to trace it, but was unable to do so. He ascertained that the car had in fact been shipped, but that through some mysterious agency it had been stopped in transit and never reached its destination. As his only alternative he put in a bill to the railroad company for the value of the car of lumber, which was readily paid, but he never could ascertain what had become of the car of lumber. The fact was, as he well knew, that the lumber association, having control of that particular division, had prohibited that independent sawmill man from selling to anybody excepting the "regular" trade, as they term it.

Further, this autocratic system prescribes a minimum price at which lumber may be sold at retail, and if any retail dealer sells for less than that amount he is blacklisted and his supply shut off, and he will not be able to buy lumber anywhere. If some unsophisticated person starts an independent lumber yard in a town, he is at once notified by the association that he must conform to their rules, buying only from regular wholesalers and not selling below the minimum price fixed by them. If he should refuse to comply with their demand, he will soon find that he has been blacklisted and will be unable to procure the lumber necessary to conduct his business. Competition is in this manner entirely eliminated and a monopoly of the lumber business obtained. The price, both to the lumberman and to the purchaser, is fixed by this artificial law and not by the natural law of supply and demand and healthy competition. In the State in which I live there are agencies of old-line lumber companies, but there is no competition between them, all of them being regulated by the trust's rules and commands, and the builder desiring to have different yards figure on a bill of lumber will find when he comes to compare the estimates furnished him that there is little or no difference in the figures, and if he had possession of the minimum list furnished by the trust he could readily ascertain which one had come the nearest to it. While the trust imposes a minimum price on the retailer, there is no maximum. They can bleed the purchaser for as much as they please above the minimum price. The profits derived by the trust from this method of transacting business can be readily appreciated. They are in position to force the bona fide small lumberman down to the lowest notch when they purchase from him, and by maintaining this minimum price fixed by them at such arbitrary figure as they see fit they regulate from time to time the tribute which they shall levy upon the consuming public. Is it any wonder that recently it was learned that one man in this trust had accumulated quietly and inconspicuously a fortune which rivals that of the famed oil king?

We all know how the prices of lumber have advanced during the last ten years. They have increased from 50 to 100 per cent and even more. This is undoubtedly due to two causes: First, the natural cause, the decrease in supply; but more than that, it has been caused by the artificial law furnished by this lumber trust that can prescribe the prices at which lumber may be sold.

I read the other day of a small independent lumber concern in North Carolina that was forced into the hands of a receiver. Why? Was it because they did not have a market for their lumber? There never was a greater demand for lumber than there is to-day, but the trust limits the supply which can be put upon the market. It stands in this intermediary position between the producer and the consumer where it can say to the producer "you shall produce and sell so much and no more;" and then say to the consumer "you shall pay so much and no less." It stands in this position between the producer and the consumer and, as I say, it has exerted an unhealthy influence upon the country and is a disturbing factor in the industrial and commercial affairs of the country.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Will the gentleman from South Dakota yield?

Mr. HALL. I will.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. The gentleman seems so familiar with these facts that I want to ask him if it can be possible that in Texas and Mississippi and Georgia and Florida and North Carolina such things can be going on?

Mr. HALL. All I can say to the gentleman in reply to that is——

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. That trusts are organized and directing the control of this industry and the citizens are saying and doing nothing?

Mr. HALL. There are a number of associations throughout the United States, it is said, who have control over certain territory. I think there are six or seven of these associations. They have a common head, where the circulars are printed and they furnish the supply. Now, these circulars are printed in the same type and the prices are substantially uniform, but different heads are placed on them for the different associations. I want the gentleman to understand this, that I do not claim that every lumberman's association is implicated in this trust combination.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I wanted to know if they existed in these Southern States—Arkansas and the others?

Mr. HALL. I do not reside in the South, and I can not state from actual observation. The best of my information is that this condition extends from the Eastern coast to the Western coast and from the Northern to the Southern boundary, and operates to the detriment of the independent producer just as much as it does of the consumer.

This trust, as I have said, is one of the most iniquitous, far-reaching, and monopolistic combinations in the United States. It is not only a disturber of commercial and financial conditions, but a most gigantic engine of oppression, and at the expense of the deforestation of our country, at the expense of the independent lumberman and the helpless purchaser, at the expense of the growth, development, and upbuilding of the country, is levying a tribute to enrich a handful of men beyond the dreams of Crœsus. This enormous power must be broken and this trust dissolved if ever the lumber trade, both from the standpoint of the producer and the purchaser, is to be placed upon a fair and legitimate basis.

A letter written by Mr. Herman Ridder, president of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, to the Attorney-General under date of March 4, 1908, appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 6, calling attention to the paper trust and its disastrous effects upon publishers and the reading public and showing the manner of its operations and how it is waxing fat at the expense of that great hard-worked and brainy army of news and magazine publishers of the country—an army which is as essential for the protection of the liberties of the people and infinitely more essential for their enlightenment than our armies in the field and our floating forts upon the seas. My time being limited, it will be impossible for me at this time to exhaust this subject, but suffice to say that it appears that the International Paper Company is a trust in active operation that originated in 1898, absorbing twenty-four paper mills, producing about 80 per cent of the entire American output, capitalized for $55,000,000 on property which could probably be reproduced by a present investment of $15,000,000; that since its organization it has taken in other mills, and the purchasers of paper are paying extraordinary dividends on the watered stock of this concern.

Mr. Ridder says, and he is in a position to know, that the seven groups of the American Paper and Pulp Association connected with this trust cooperate to stifle competition, to increase prices, and to put an additional burden of $60,000,000 per annum upon the printing and publishing interests of the country without other justification than the power of combination. He calls attention to the records of proceedings, showing that a pool was formed under the chairmanship of one John H. Parks, their proceedings, among other things, containing an agreement to fix prices and to advance them—an advance that ultimately reached $12 per ton—restrictions of production and allotments of output by each of the twenty-four mills, divisions of 70 per cent of the proceeds of the pool, allowance to mills that shut down, imposition of penalty for shipment in excess of allotments, restriction of shipping to a special class, the fixing of commissions therefor, participation in the organization by members of the General Paper Company, who had been prohibited by a Federal court from participating in such combinations, and instructions to counsel to find a plan for conducting the affairs of the association in such manner as to defeat any attack made upon it by the Federal or State governments.

He further shows that at one of the pool meetings held in February, 1907, an advance of $3 per ton was ordered, another $3 advance in May, another one of $4 in August, and that in November a shut down of one week was ordered to restrict production, thus artificially stimulating the price. Mr. Ridder says:

> News-print paper mills that are not entirely modern are now making paper at figures that show a profit of more than $20 per ton on the paper prices just announced by the International Paper Company ($52.50 per ton). In other words, for paper delivered say, in New York, up-to-date mills are making a profit of more than 60 per cent on the cost of manufacture, delivery, and storage, and they are making a profit of 40 per cent upon a reasonable allowance for the capital required by a modern plant. * * * In 1905, when the International Paper Company was admittedly selling paper at $38 per ton, delivered on the sidewalk, it made a profit of $5 per ton, as shown by its annual report, indicating that the cost delivered on the sidewalk was $33 per ton, and that the cost at mills was averaging about $29 per ton. * * * These illegal combinations have imposed burdens upon consumers of all kinds of paper, and, if carried out as indicated by the published utterances of the leaders of the various groups, they will add at least $60,000,000 per annum to the cost of paper as compared with two years ago.

These facts speak for themselves.

Mr. TIRRELL. I would like to ask the gentleman if in that letter there are any facts to substantiate that statement, and also whether it has not been shown, and he has not admitted, that the facts as quoted from the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], obtained from the Bureau of the Census, were not entirely correct as to the prices of paper.

Mr. HALL. I will say in reply to the gentleman that all I know about the letter is what appears in the RECORD. It purports to be extracts from the letter and perhaps not the complete letter itself.

The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL] recently, in his remarks made in this House, stated that about one-third of the pulp wood is imported from Canada, and that "the trouble is there is not raw material here sufficient to keep the mills going." Further, he made several quotations from Canadian sources indicating their intention to impose an export duty on pulp wood so as to preserve the paper market to that country. Now, if we are in need of the raw material from Canada for our paper mills, clearly we should impose no import duty upon wood pulp; and if our paper manufacturers can, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL], manufacture such a superior quality of paper, which outsells the Canadian paper, and the insignificant 15 per cent duty on paper is not necessary for the protection of the American paper mills, then that should be abolished.

This would not necessitate the abolition of the retaliatory features of the statute. While the facts stated by the gentleman show a great familiarity with the subject, conceding his premises and the facts as stated by him, I am unable to arrive at the same conclusion logically that he did, because he stated that the manufacturers of paper in the United States could produce paper more cheaply and of better quality than could be produced in Canada, and——

Mr. TIRRELL. Did I not add, provided the present law was continued by which our manufacturers were able to obtain pulp wood free from Canada?

Mr. HALL. I had not completed my remark. The gentleman stated that the 15 per cent ad valorem duty was insignificant and that the paper manufacturers of the United States did not require that insignificant 15 per cent duty for their protection, but he did advocate, as I recollect it—and if I misquote the gentleman I beg leave to be corrected—the retention of the wood-pulp tariff of about $1.66 a ton, or at any rate the portion of the tariff law which imposes a retaliatory or countervailing duty, which works automatically. Am I correct about this?

Mr. TIRRELL. Yes.

Mr. HALL. Now, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIRRELL] if he, representing as his constituents the paper manufacturers, desires to be understood—I did not quite glean it from his remarks—that he advocates the retention of the present duty on wood pulp?

Mr. TIRRELL. As a retaliatory duty to secure free admission of pulp wood only.

Mr. HALL. In conclusion, I desire to urge and emphasize the necessity for prompt legislation by this body along the lines which I have indicated. The repeal of these tariff duties on the products of the forest does not necessitate any general revision of the tariff laws. This subject stands in a class by itself. The timber supply of the country can be preserved and assured, but only by prompt action on our part. This Sixtieth Congress is the pilot at the wheel of the ship of state and upon it now devolves the responsibility of its course. The breakers are already in sight and the dull boom of the swell on the rocks is heard admonishing us of our impending fate. Shall we continue on the present course to wreck and disaster, bringing upon our heads the reproach and anathemas of our countrymen and future generations? Shall we earn the contempt and ridicule of wiser and more provident sister nations? Shall we receive the criticism and condemnation of future historians for being improvident, unwise, and impractical? I trust not. Let us promptly crystallize into law at least one of the recommendations urged in the message of a wise, patriotic, and far-seeing President. Let us not, by looking only to the profits of to-day from the forests, be lulled to sleep by the fragrant incense burned at the shrine of Mammon, nor lured to destruction by the sweet-voiced siren who sings of delay because of self-interest or for political expedient, but let us arouse from this stupor of apathy, put the helm hard aport, and swept by the fair breeze of righteous public sentiment, guiding our course by the polar star of patriotic duty, sail into the harbor of safety. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, some time ago I introduced in this body the following amendment, which I now send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read:

SECTION 1. That the act entitled "An act to regulate trade and commerce against unlawful restraint and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding to it the following section, to be known as "section 9:"

"This act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with the view of lessening the number of hours of labor or of increasing their wages, nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combination among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with the view of enhancing the price of agriculture or horticulture products."

This is an amendment to what is commonly known as the "Sherman antitrust act," which became a law in the year 1890.

At that period the people of this country were very much wrought up over the conduct of certain great aggregations of capital, which had already begun to make their existence felt. These trusts, as they were beginning to be called, true to the very nature of their being and in accordance with the objects and purposes of those who had called them into existence, had, to a greater or lesser extent, succeeded in destroying their competitors, and while at that time only a few commodities were under their control, yet that control was such and the use they made of their power was such that the people came to fear the unseen operations of these combinations.

The attitude of the public mind on the subject found its expression in a number of bills introduced into State legislatures all over the country and in the Senate of Congress and in this House.

One of these bills was the act to which I have referred, introduced by Senator Sherman, of Ohio. The debates published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD plainly show to anyone who cares to go over the history of that period as reflected therein just what was in the minds of the legislators on this subject.

There can be no question but that this legislation was intended to reach the vast combinations of capital like the Western Union Telegraph Company, the beef trust, the Standard Oil Company and hundreds of others which now affect us, but were not then in existence. The debates also show that many of the Senators feared that the proposed legislation might be more far-reaching than it appeared to be on its face, and that in addition to curbing and controlling the trusts it might possibly be so construed as to include those organizations commonly known as "labor unions," the right of which to exist and operate up to that time had never been questioned, at least so far as Federal legislation was concerned.

In this connection I desire to call the attention of the House to the following language, uttered when the Sherman Act was under consideration, by Senator TELLER, of Colorado, in a colloquy with Senator George:

[Fifty-first Congress, first session, p. 2561.]

Mr. TELLER. There has recently been organized, in the Northern States more particularly, and I suppose it will spread all over the country, what is called a National League among the farmers, for the same identical purpose that the Farmers' Alliance has been organized for. Shall it be said that these organizations are forbidden by law? Is it possible that we are putting it in the power of some men to coerce and force the farmers to abandon these organizations? Does anybody believe that these organizations are inimical and hostile to the public welfare? On the contrary, does not everybody know that unless we can by some method increase the price of farm products in this country a great many farmers in the United States will be in bankruptcy and turned out of their homes?

* * * * * * *

Mr. TELLER. That is what I was saying. It seems to me that is the fact. While I am extremely anxious to take hold of and control these great trusts, these combinations of capital which are disturbing the commerce of the country and are disturbing legitimate trade, I do not want to go to the extent of interfering with organizations which I think are absolutely justifiable by the remarkable condition of things now existing in this country.

I believe this bill will go further than that. I believe it will interfere with the Knights of Labor as an organization. While I have never been very much in love with the Knights of Labor, because of some of their methods, yet their right to combine for their mutual protection and for their advancement can not be denied. While in many instances I think they have gone beyond what they should have done, beyond what was legitimate and proper, yet, on the whole, we can not deny to the laborers of the country the opportunity to combine, whether for the purpose of putting up the price of their labor or securing to themselves a better position in the world, provided always, of course, that they use lawful means. I do not believe the mere fact of combining to secure to themselves a half dollar a day more wages or greater influence or power in the country can be said to be an unlawful combination.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. The Knights of Labor, as I understand, are an organization composed of citizens of the different States of the Union, probably of every State of the Union. The object of that organization, as I understand furthermore, is to increase the price of their wages. Now, increasing the price of wages has a tendency, in the language of this bill, to increase the price of the product of their labor. Are they not also included, then, in the bill of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. When I said that the Knights of Labor were included I meant that they were included both in the civil provisions and in the criminal provisions. In my judgment, they are in both. I do not believe that anybody in the Senate proposes to go to that extent. It is suggested to me by a Senator near me that the Typographical Union would come in in the same way.

Mr. HISCOCK. And it would practically include all the trades unions.

Mr. TELLER. It would practically include perhaps all the trades unions in this country. Many of these organizations are corporations. If they are not, at least they will be termed "combinations" under this bill.

Senator TELLER, to further illustrate the point he was making, asked leave to insert and did insert in the RECORD a document headed, "Pathetic plea for aid—East End tailors of London petition the Queen for help—A hopeless set of workmen," which, with the permission of the House, I desire to have printed in the RECORD accompanying my remarks.

This paper set out the deplorable condition of a number of English workingmen who had been crushed by the remorseless sweating system of their time.

Senator TELLER, in the course of his remarks, asked the Senator from Ohio if it was the intention of the bill to have its provisions apply to men like these. Various other Senators also questioned the propriety of the legislation for the same reason.

Senator Morgan, referring to this subject, said:

There is a great deal of danger. I think I can see it in almost every direction in legislating upon questions of this kind. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. Stewart] has called attention to a very important topic in this connection. I do not know of anything that has a greater or a more direct impression upon our foreign commerce and our interstate commerce than the price of labor. There are combinations among our laboring men of various different fraternities continually being made for the purpose of raising the price of labor. The price of labor when raised by combination, or, if you please so to call it, by a conspiracy, or in the nature of a trust confided to the hands of some managing committee, some steering arrangement—combinations of that kind to raise the price of labor must necessarily increase the price of commodities in interstate commerce and international commerce, at least to the extent of the exports that we send abroad.

Now, while we are legislating against all such combinations and conspiracies that affect the price of commodities interchanged between the States of this Union, what are we to say to the men who, in their Knights of Labor and in their wheels and in all of their various organizations, meet together for the very purpose of raising the price of labor in the particular industry in which they are concerned or the price of labor generally? Labor is a commodity bought and sold every hour in the day. It is so much a commodity as that we forbid its importation here when it comes under contract; we treat it just as we would spurious medicines or base coin or something of that sort; we tax it as we do oleomargarine. We treat labor precisely as if it were a commodity, and it is a commodity that is imported into this country.

If we pass a law here to punish men for entering into combination and conspiracy to raise the price of labor, what is the reason why we are not within the purview of the powers of Congress in respect to international commerce? Who can answer the proposition as a matter of law?

* * * * * * *

So insistent were the Senators on this point, which was perhaps the one most potently urged against the bill, that Senator Sherman, the author of the bill, took great pains to assure the Senators that they were in error, and I here quote from his remarks on the subject:

* * * * * * *

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, all I desire is that this bill, the object of which I believe is approved by more than three-fourths of the Senate, should be treated like all other bills that have been carefully considered by a committee of this body and reported to the Senate. To attempt to defeat this bill by offering various other bills from other committees or from the other House on different branches of the same subject or on entirely different subjects, is not the proper way to deal with the work of a committee.

Now, let us look at it. The bill as reported contains three or four simple propositions which relate only to contracts, combinations, agreements made with a view and designed to carry out a certain purpose, which the laws of all the States and of every civilized community declare to be unlawful. It does not interfere in the slightest degree with voluntary associations made to affect public opinion to advance the interests of a particular trade or occupation. It does not interfere with the Farmers' Alliance at all, because that is an association of farmers to advance their interests and to improve the growth and manner of production of their crops and to secure intelligent growth and to introduce new methods. No organizations in this country can be more beneficial in their character than farmers' alliances and farmers' associations. They are not business combinations. They do not deal with contracts, agreements, etc. They have no connection with them. And so the combinations of workingmen to promote their interests, promote their welfare, and increase their pay, if you please, to get their fair share in the division of production, are not affected in the slightest degree, nor can they be included in the words or intent of the bill as now reported.

Senator George, despite the fact that Senator Sherman believed it unnecessary, then offered the amendment which was unanimously adopted by the Senate, and which I have again introduced and on which I am now addressing the committee.

Later on in the debates, in answer to a suggestion of some Senator, Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, a State that has long been renowned for the liberality and equity of its labor legislation, commented on the George amendment as follows:

Mr. HOAR. When you are speaking of providing to regulate the transactions of men who are making corners in wheat, or in iron, or in woolen, or in cotton goods, speculating in them or lawfully dealing in them without speculation, you are aiming at a mere commercial transaction, the beginning and end of which is the making of money for the parties, and nothing else. That is the only relation that transaction has to the state. It is the creation or diffusion or change of ownership of the wealth of the community. But when a laborer is trying to raise his wages or is endeavoring to shorten the hours of his labor, he is dealing with something that touches closely, more closely than anything else, the government and the character of the state itself.

The maintenance of a certain standard of profit in dealing in large transaction in wheat or cotton or wool is a question whether a particular merchant or a particular class of merchants shall make money or not, or shall deal lawfully or not, shall affect the State injuriously or not; but the question whether the standard of the laborer's wages shall be maintained or advanced or whether the leisure for instruction for improvement shall be shortened or lengthened is a question which touches the very existence and character of government of the State itself. The laborer who is engaged lawfully and usefully and accomplishing his purpose in whole or in part in endeavoring to raise the standard of wages is engaged in an occupation the success of which makes Republican government itself possible, and without which the Republic can not in substance, however it may nominally do in form, continue to exist.

I hold, therefore, that as legislators we may constitutionally, properly, and wisely allow laborers to make associations, combinations, contracts, agreements for the sake of maintaining and advancing their wages, in regard to which, as a rule, their contracts are to be made with large corporations who are themselves but an association or combination or aggregation of capital on the other side. When we are permitting and even encouraging that, we are permitting and encouraging what is not only lawful, wise, and profitable, but absolutely essential to the existence of the Commonwealth itself.

When, on the other hand, we are dealing with one of the other classes, the combinations aimed at chiefly by this bill, we are dealing with a transaction the only purpose of which is to extort from the community, monopolize, segregate, and apply to individual use, for the purposes of individual greed, wealth which ought properly and lawfully and for the public interest to be generally diffused over the whole community.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HOAR. I put in the committee, if I may be permitted to say so (I suppose there is no impropriety in it), the precise question which has been put by the Senator from West Virginia, and I had that precise difficulty in the first place with this bill, but I was answered, and I think all the other members of the committee agreed in the answer, that "monopoly" is a technical term known to the common law, and that it signifies—I do not mean to say that they stated what the signification was—but I became satisfied that they were right and that the word "monopoly" is a merely technical term which has a clear and legal signification, and it is this: It is the sole engrossing to a man's self by means which prevent other men from engaging in fair competition with him.

Of course a monopoly granted by the king was a direct inhibition of all other persons to engage in that business or calling or to acquire that particular article, except the man who had a monopoly granted him by the sovereign power. I suppose, therefore, that the courts of the United States would say in the case put by the Senator from West Virginia that a man who merely by superior skill and intelligence, a breeder of horses, or raiser of cattle, or manufacturer, or artisan of any kind, got the whole business because nobody could do it as well as he could was not a monopolist, but that it involved something like the use of means which made it impossible for other persons to engage in fair competition, like the engrossing, the buying up of all other persons engaged in the same business.

Senator Sherman expressed himself as being perfectly satisfied with the George amendment, and asked the Committee of the Whole to insert it in the bill. He complained, however, of many other amendments which were adopted and charged that it was the intent and purpose of some Senators to so load down the bill with bad amendments as to insure its destruction.

Senator Sherman stated over and over again that his bill was extremely simple, was intended only to curb aggregations of capital, which were destructive of competition and oppressive to the people, and had no other object in view.

It was finally, against his wish and against his vote, together with that of many other Senators, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, and when it emerged from that committee it did not contain the George amendment, nor did it contain any language on the subject of labor unions, nor anything calculated to lead any person to believe that its provisions contemplated anything but the regulation and control of the so-called "trusts" of the time, which had furnished a reason and a necessity for this legislation.

The bill when it came to the House was passed hurriedly, as may be gathered from the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the present Speaker of this House.

Mr. CANNON. * * * Now, then, I want to say I believe this bill to be a good one; and I will be honest enough to say that I have not been able to give its provisions much consideration. I have not been a legislative drone this session of Congress; but after reading it and listening to the explanation of its provisions, it seems to me that it is a measure of great value, conservatively drawn, and discussed at the other end of the Capitol, and comes to this House with the unanimous support of the able committee presided over by the able gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Ezra B. Taylor. What does it do? It defines the combinations and conspiracies in restraint of trade among the several States and with foreign countries and declares them illegal. Then it furnishes a remedy:

First. It makes such combination or conspiracy a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment.

Second. It gives to any person injured by such combination an action for damages, and he can recover three times the damages sustained, with costs, including a reasonable attorney's fee.

Third. It invokes the equity side—the great restraining power of the court—and makes it the duty of the United States district attorneys, under the direction of the Attorney-General, to go upon the equity side of the court and invoke the strong hand of the chancellor, backed by the whole power of the United States, and cause the same to be laid upon any person or corporation in the United States that is violating, or about to violate, the provisions of this act, and compel him to halt—to refrain from or to cease violating the same.

Fourth. It forfeits to the United States any property owned under any contract or by any combination which is used in violation of the provisions of the act.

This is a short summary of the facts in connection with the passage of this very important legislation.

Everyone familiar with the events of recent times is aware that so far as the original purposes and objects of the bill are concerned, or at least so far as its administration is concerned, it has been a conspicuous and total failure. Where at the time of the passage of the act there was one trust in existence, there is at the present time a hundred, fattening themselves on the production of the people of this great nation.

While it seems it was not possible to reach combinations of capital through this legislation, no such difficulty has been experienced in applying its provisions to organizations of labor.

The labor unions of this country or the organized workingmen of this country, demanding as they do a fair share of that which they produce, have many and powerful enemies in high places throughout this land, but up to this time the bitterest of these has never contended that any legal barrier should be placed between the workingman and his right, in combination with his fellows, to withdraw from employment in order to enforce his demands. It seems now, however, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in what for convenience I will call the "Danbury hat case," this right is not only to be questioned but denied.

It seems that under the provisions of an act avowedly and specifically passed for the purpose of protecting the people of this country against the machinations of combined wealth an instrument is found to strike from the hands of these people the most powerful weapon they could wield to protect themselves against these attacks.

The facts in this case are as follows, and as gathered from the opinion of the Supreme Court: Plaintiffs were manufacturers of hats in Danbury, Conn., having a factory there and engaged in trade in other States; that they were dependent upon interstate trade to consume the product of their factory; the defendants were members of the United Hatters of North America; that defendants were engaged in a scheme to force the manufacturers of this class of hats, including the plaintiffs, to unionize their factory; that out of eighty-two manufacturers of this country, seventy had so organized their factories; that plaintiffs refused the demands of defendants, and defendants thereupon to enforce said demands caused its members to simultaneously withdraw from the employment of defendants, and that defendants thereupon gave notice to its members and friends throughout the country that it had done so.

This conduct on the part of the hatters' union the Supreme Court says brings it within the provisions of this act. This suit was started in the United States circuit court for the district of Connecticut, and I am informed is of such a character that the property of every individual member of that union is involved in the present suit. So much for the legislation and the decisions of the court on the subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the millions of laboring people of this country, every one of whom is more or less involved in this legislation and in this decision, are looking to this Congress for relief, and they have a right to expect relief from us. They have a right to expect relief from this Administration. The Republican party has been able to convince them in nearly all the elections of recent years that it was a sincere friend of the producing masses of this country. You have told them in season and out of season, on the stump throughout this country, and on the floor of this House, that your one great object and one care was to look after the welfare of the workingmen of this nation. You have excused the oppressive tariff on the plea that its exactions were necessary in order that good wages and satisfactory conditions might be secured to the laboring men of this country. I have seen gentlemen on the other side of the House almost in tears at the thought of what would ensue should any desecrating hand touch these sacred tariff schedules, and thus interfere with your special wards and protégés.

Mr. Chairman, in addressing myself to this subject at this time, I am exercising one of the few prerogatives that is left to a Member of this one-time deliberative body. Things have come to a pass, and the rules of this House are such, that we deliberate when we are told and we stop deliberating when we are told to stop deliberating. [Applause].

I introduced this amendment shortly after the decision of the Supreme Court in this case, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, that veritable Golgotha, bristling with the bones of bills embodying the wishes and desires of the people. The rules of the House provide no way in which I, a Member of this body, representing a sovereign constituency, can have an opportunity to lay this matter before the House for action.

Like any other legislator who has confidence in his measure I would regard it a privilege to be permitted to bring this matter before the House and discuss it with the other Members of this body. This privilege is denied to me, and therefore I am exercising one of the few prerogatives that is left and am attempting to call the attention of the committee, the House, and the country in the hope that the powers that be may be influenced to move in the matter. I can not leave this phase of the subject without calling the attention of the House to the fact that when the criminal code bill was under consideration in this body it then had an opportunity to pass similar legislation to this.

Section 19 of the criminal code bill provided that if two or more men should conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise of a right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States they should be subject to a fine of $5,000 and imprisoned not more than two years and be ineligible to office.

The Members will remember that I, at that time, offered an amendment to that section providing in general language that it should not apply to combinations of persons agreeing to leave or enter the employment of another.

The same arguments were advanced against this amendment as were advanced in favor of the Sherman bill. It was held that the section could not possibly apply to the kind of combinations that the section dealt with. Vainly did the Members on this side of the House beg the majority to make assurance doubly sure by stating in unqualified language that the section did not apply, but the amendment was defeated and shortly afterwards the decision of the Supreme Court in the "Danbury hat case" showed that the provisions of the said section did apply.

You have posed for years as the shield and buckler of the laboring class and it looks to you now to make good your pretensions and to relieve them from this oppressive legislation, for which you so proudly claim the credit. They are, perhaps, beginning to realize that there is some slight inconsistency in your avowed friendliness for them, which has hitherto manifested itself in compelling them to purchase the commodities of life from the trusts in a protected market while forcing them to sell their labor in a market that is open to the competition of the world.

They are, perhaps, beginning to notice the inconsistency that shuts out from them what they eat and wear, and overwhelms them with what they sell—their labor. They are beginning to ask, perhaps, how it is that in the operations of an Administration so friendly to them a satisfactory eight-hour law can not be passed. They are beginning to wonder about the mysterious end of various and sundry bills to limit traffic in convict-made articles. They are even demanding to know why it is that from a Government, Republican in all its branches, they can not get anti-injunction legislation.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania a few days ago, at the beginning of his very able speech, took occasion to classify himself as one of those who believed in the policy of the President, and in the next breath he said, as though by an uncontrollable association of ideas, "We are about to enter on a Presidential campaign." I submit that fact to you, gentlemen, and Mr. Chairman, in connection with this legislation that I have been speaking about. I submit it to the Speaker, whose power and influence is admitted from one end of this land to the other; I submit it to his friend from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELLE], who put him in nomination here the other day for the Presidency, and I respectfully say to him that the fervent speech by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], from which he quoted, demanding the publication and distribution of public documents to the farmers and workingmen of this country, did great credit to that gentleman; but, Mr. Chairman, there are matters of much more moment to the farmers and workingmen of this country than the distribution of horse books and poultry bulletins can ever be, and I assert that more benefit can be done to these people whom every candidate for the Presidency is now so anxious to aid, by the passage of this legislation, than by the distribution of all the public documents that have been sent out in the last thirty-two years. [Applause.]

"Friends of the people are known by acts and measures and not by words." These words were uttered by Demosthenes three hundred and twenty-eight years before the birth of Christ, and were quoted with approval by a distinguished gentleman of our own time, who took occasion to remark that "words were good when backed by deeds, and only so."

Mr. Chairman, so far as those who toil are concerned, we have reached a crisis in the affairs of this nation. The working people of this country are law loving, law-abiding, and peaceful. No man who has not had the experience knows how they shrink from the thought of entering upon that last resort—the strike. They fully realize the consequences thereof. They know that the issue is always doubtful, and the result to them is bound to be trouble, privation, and, perhaps, suffering for themselves and those whom they love. But they know, Mr. Chairman, as you know, that it is their only effective weapon when all peaceful efforts have failed, and that without it they can not fail to sink to the level of those unhappy people who flocked to our shores to escape similar conditions.

In my judgment the American workingman in the coming campaign is going to demand of this Administration and of the Republican party an account of its stewardship. He is going to demand to be told who it is that has betrayed him. He is going to ask how it is that, with a flood of litigation threatening him on one hand and a flood of immigration overpowering him on the other, the weapons on which he relies to fight this unequal battle have been stricken from his hands; that the shield of his organization which is interposed to protect him from these evils has been torn away; and he will, perhaps, become at last aware of the fact that a great party, which has used him as a cloak behind which to hide the plunder of the people, has stabbed him in the back to prevent him from claiming his share of that which he produced. [Applause.]

APPENDIX.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY-TREASURER,
UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
Indianapolis, Ind., February 28, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM HUGHES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed herewith find copy of preamble and resolutions on the subject of the injunction in labor disputes, unanimously adopted by the nineteenth annual convention of the United Mine Workers of America, held in Indianapolis, Ind., January 21 to February 3, 1908.

We ask that you carefully read the same and give the subject-matter your earnest consideration.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN MITCHELL, President.
W. B. WILSON, Secretary-Treasurer.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY-TREASURER,
UNITED MINE WORKERS OF AMERICA,
Indianapolis, Ind., February 28, 1908.

Hon. WILLIAM HUGHES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed herewith find copy of preamble and resolutions relating to the principles of the McHenry bill, which were unanimously adopted by the nineteenth annual convention of the United Mine Workers of America, held in Indianapolis, Ind., January 21 to February 3, 1908.

We trust that this bill or a bill embodying these principles may receive your careful and favorable consideration.

Respectfully, yours,

JOHN MITCHELL, President.
W. B. WILSON, Secretary-Treasurer.

The special committee on injunctions reported the following preamble and resolutions to the nineteenth annual convention of the United Mine Workers of America, which were unanimously adopted:

We, your committee on government by injunction, after a thorough investigation of the subject, beg leave to submit the following for your careful consideration:

There is no one right for which the English-speaking people of the world have contended with greater zeal than that of trial by jury in all cases where alleged violations of the law have taken place and the life, liberty, or property of any citizen has been involved.

The peace of Wedmore, concluded between Alfred the Great and Guthram the Dane, in the year 878 A. D., provided that "If a king's thane be charged with killing a man, if he dares to clear himself, let him do it before twelve kings' thanes." The Magna Charta of Great Britain, wrested from King John because of the arbitrary methods of his judicial agents, declared that "No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or dissoised, or outlawed, or banished, or in any way destroyed, nor will we pass upon him, nor will we send upon him, unless by the judgment of his peers." The Declaration of Independence gives as one of the causes of the separation from the mother country "for depriving us in many cases of the benefit of trial by jury." The Constitution of the United States and of the several States guarantees this right. Many wars have been waged, innumerable laws have been passed, judges have been impeached and deposed in order to maintain this sacred right which has long been recognized as one of the principal pillars in the structure of human liberty.

This course has been made necessary because experience has demonstrated that judges are human and prone to human errors, and while many of them may hear and determine such cases as come before them with conscientious care, there are those who do not hesitate to stretch or even break the law in their eagerness to promote the interests of those who are in a position to assist them in securing wealth, power, or notoriety.

All men are more or less influenced by their associations. Judges are like other men; they are moved by the same feelings, prejudices, or passions that influence ordinary citizens. Their associates are men of wealth and their social circle is one that few workingmen enter. Their discussions of economical and industrial questions are almost invariably with the rich and affluent, who view the whole field of human effort from the standpoint of an employer. Judges would be more than human if they did not gradually, even though unconsciously, become tainted with the ideas of some of the employing classes which are so widely at variance with the standards of right and equity revered by millions of those who toil. With a knowledge of these facts wageworkers would be false to themselves, their families, and republican institutions if they failed to protest, with all the vigor and power they possessed, against any system of jurisprudence that can deprive a citizen of his liberty or property without the facts in his case having first been determined by a jury of his peers.

The broad scope that has recently been given to injunctions in labor disputes places an unlimited power in the hands of one man, and it makes no difference whether you call that man a czar or a judge, the result is the same. If he has a right to restrain a thousand men, the same right would apply to a million. If he can by law restrain a portion of the people, he can by the same law restrain the remainder and thus make himself dictator. Those who have not felt the heavy hand of this despotic system may feel secure in the enjoyment of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," but it is a false security. The power that can break the Constitution to crush the employees of a coal king or a railroad magnate—that can restrain the competitors of a trust or a syndicate—can destroy the business and curtail the liberties of any citizen whenever it suits the purpose of that power to do so.

Injunctions are not a modern innovation in the jurisprudence of the world, although their use in labor disputes is of very recent introduction. They can be traced into the remote past, and have been handed down to us from the days of absolute despotism, when the monarch, combining in his own person the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of government, issued his edict personally, or through his judicial agents, restraining persons from doing those things which were obnoxious to him.

In the early English practice, from which our system was derived, the court in chancery had the sole privilege of issuing injunctions, but it was only exercised in those cases where the property of the plaintiff was threatened with damage for which the statute or common law provided no adequate remedy. Upon this claim of the English courts our State and Federal judiciaries base their power to issue injunctions.

Injunctions in labor disputes are usually granted against violent or unlawful acts, for which the State or common law provides ample remedy, and is a clear violation of the right of trial by jury. They go far beyond the point of protecting the property interests of the plaintiff, and deny to the members of the trade union that has been restrained their constitutional right of public assemblage. They prevent us from going upon our own property to hold meetings, because it may happen to be near to or within sight of the property of our employers, although it would be difficult to imagine how it would be possible for us to own any property that is not adjacent to some other property. They deny us the right to talk to our fellow-citizens and endeavor to persuade them to cease working for the plaintiff, and injunctions embodying these orders are granted because it is alleged that if meetings are held, and the employees are induced to cease work, the property of the employer will be injured beyond any legal means of redress. That their property is entitled to the same protection that the property of other citizens receive can not be denied, but when an injunction is issued restraining the members of a union from in any manner interfering with an employee it carries with it the assumption on the part of the court that the employer seeking the order has a property interest in his employees, an assumption absolutely contrary to the letter of our Constitution and the spirit of our laws.

The only objects attained by their issue is to embarrass the wageworkers in their efforts to secure higher wages and better conditions of employment and to take out of the hands of a jury the right to hear and determine the facts in any case of violation, or alleged violation, of law.

The trade-unionists of our country never have, and do not now, ask for any immunity from the requirements of the law. We are now, and ever have been, defenders of law and order. We ask no special privileges at the hands of our Government. We seek only to secure for ourselves the same rights that are accorded to other citizens of our land, and we will not cease this agitation while the power remains in the hands of any one person, be he judge or layman, to issue an injunction revoking our constitutional rights to publicly assemble and freely discuss our grievances, and to deprive us of our liberty or property without the fact of our guilt having first been determined by a jury of our peers.

If the liberties of the American people are to be maintained; if we are to perpetuate a "Government of the people, for the people, and by the people;" if we would prevent a moneyed oligarchy from usurping the rights of the Republic, the power to issue and enforce injunctions in labor disputes must be taken from the courts. Persons must be punished for the crimes they have committed when a jury of their peers has determined their guilt, and under no pretense must they be deprived of liberty or property through the judgment, malignity, self-interest, or caprice of any one man.

If we desire relief from this condition that has grown upon us we must act in concert. We must first understand our needs and then put into effect the necessary machinery to get relief. We have nearly one-half million voters directly engaged in mining in the United States, who are distributed throughout the country in such proportions that we may determine the composition of Congress, and when we remember this fact we realize that if we do not secure remedial legislation the fault is our own. If we expect to secure relief, every laboring man must act, not by denouncing the courts or those who issue injunctions, but to demand of our Representatives in Congress to know where they stand with reference to the growing evil of government by injunction.

The American Federation of Labor has indorsed the Pearre bill intending to remedy this wrong. No measure can be more important than one necessary to protect the rights and liberties of the people. We therefore recommend the indorsement of the Pearre bill without amendments of any kind, and urge that every official and member of our organization write personal letters to their Congressmen and Senators urging the passage of this bill immediately.

We recommend that the United Mine Workers of America cooperate with any and all other organizations that may desire to cooperate with us in securing the passage of this measure, and we therefore recommend that the international officials be instructed to communicate with every national and international trade organization urging them to take similar action.

Respectfully submitted.

T. L. LEWIS, Chairman.
W. B. WILSON, Secretary.

Attest:
JOHN MITCHELL, President.
W. B. WILSON, Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. BENNET of New York, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TOWNSEND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16268, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 2429. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war with Spain and other wars, and to the widows of such soldiers and sailors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SLEMP, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for one week from Monday, the 16th, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for printing and binding for the Department of the Interior, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

A bill (S. 6148) granting an increase of pension to Reuben H. Baird (with the accompanying paper).

Mr. RICHARDSON introduced a bill (S. 6149) granting an increase of pension to David Pollock, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6150) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Smyrna, Del., which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. TAYLOR introduced a bill (S. 6151) for the relief of tobacco growers, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6152) to improve the Cumberland River, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6153) for the allowance of certain claims of the people of Tennessee reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker acts, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6154) to authorize the construction of a national road from the city of Nashville, Tenn., to the Federal cemetery, and thence by The Hermitage back to Nashville, and to aid the Ladies' Hermitage Association to maintain The Hermitage, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SMOOT introduced a bill (S. 6155) to provide for an enlarged homestead, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 6156) providing for the opening of the Fort Keogh Military Reservation to settlement, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 6157) to provide for a uniform and simultaneous weighing of the mails on railroad routes, and an equitable adjustment of the compensation for the carriage of such mails, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. GORE introduced a bill (S. 6158) granting an increase of pension to Joseph S. Works, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DIXON introduced a bill (S. 6159) to establish a permanent national bison range, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WARNER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 6160) to amend section 5 of an act entitled "An act to require the erection of fire escapes in certain buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved March 19, 1906, as amended by act of Congress approved March 2, 1907, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEMENWAY introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 6161) for the relief of Rufus Neal; and

A bill (S. 6162) for the relief of W. C. Utz, administrator of the estate of Joshua Wiley, deceased.

Mr. PILES introduced a bill (S. 6163) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell and dispose of the surplus unallotted agricultural lands of the Spokane Indian Reservation, Wash., and to place the timber lands of said reservation in a national forest, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6164) granting an increase of pension to Jeremiah Robbins, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORE (by request) introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 70) for the enrollment of certain persons as members of the Osage tribe of Indians, and for other purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CRANE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $321,900 for the promotion of post-office clerks from the fifth to the sixth grade, Post-Office Department, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURROWS submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for assistant cashiers, assistant superintendents of delivery, and assistant superintendents of mails, etc., office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, from $2,954 to $5,651, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment authorizing the President to place on the retired list of the Army, with the rank of captain, any contract surgeon who has served at least thirty years, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. SCOTT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 5297. An act to complete the naval record of John Shaughnessy was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

H. R. 17311. An act to authorize the Pensacola, Mobile and New Orleans Railway Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Alabama, to construct a bridge over and across the Mobile River and its navigable channels on a line approximately east of the north boundary line of the city of Mobile, Ala., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 17520. An act for the relief of tobacco growers was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 18347. An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

TRANSACTIONS OF NEW YORK CITY BANKS, ETC.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that Senate resolution 126 be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the resolution indicated by the Senator from South Carolina before the Senate. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted on the 12th instant by Mr. TILLMAN, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance is hereby instructed to inquire and report—

First. Whether the national banks in the city of New York and elsewhere are in the habit, under the guise of commercial loans, of furnishing permanent capital for speculative or other enterprises; and if so, what legislation is necessary to prevent a continuance of such practice.

Second. Whether the Treasury Department had knowledge of the loans made by the National Bank of North America, of New York City, which are the subject of a suit by the receiver of said bank against Charles W. Morse, and of other similar transactions in other national banks.

Third. Whether national banks are now engaged, by themselves or through other organizations, in attempting to control or dictate the legislation of Congress upon currency matters.

Fourth. The committee is further instructed to ascertain what, if any, legislation is necessary to discourage or prevent the habit of persons holding the office of Comptroller of the Currency or other Treasury officials from making their offices a stepping-stone to employment by national banks.

Fifth. Whether national banks are using trust companies or other financial associations as agencies through which to transact business forbidden by the law governing national banks, and what legislation is necessary to prevent such an evasion of the statutes.

Sixth. Whether the national banks in New York City lent their credit to the stockholders by the certification or acceptance of checks during the years 1906 and 1907, and report whether or not such transactions involved any violation of the provisions of section 5200 of the Revised Statutes as to making excess loans.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the most marked feature of American politics at this time is the dominating influence and control of the executive branch of the Government over the legislative, and, in a less degree, over the judicial branches. It has taken just forty-one years for the pendulum to swing from one extreme to the other. In 1867 Andrew Johnson, who held the Executive office, had grown weaker and weaker in the struggle against the fanatical and revolutionary forces which had gathered strength during the civil war, and immediately after he was shorn of all semblance of power and narrowly escaped impeachment. To speak more accurately, he was impeached, and on the trial failed of conviction by the pitifully small margin of one vote.

He was brought to trial on the flimsy charge of having put a construction on the law which empowered him to remove his own Secretary of War and appoint another. He had swung around the circle and made speeches, none of which were in any degree more aggressive or more denunciatory of men and things than our President now delivers to applauding thousands; but those speeches were used in the impeachment as an excuse for attempting to turn him out of office under the charge that they were treasonable. It is true they were not pressed in the trial and were finally dropped out of sight, but they were thought of sufficient importance to be put in the articles of impeachment.

Then the legislative branch was haughty, insolent, and tyrannical to the last degree in its use and abuse of power. Vetoes were overridden by two-thirds votes in both Houses and the Presidency was in eclipse. The President drew his salary and lived in the White House, signed commissions, but to all intents and purposes was a nonentity and exercised no influence or control whatever over legislation, and in every way the great office of President lost prestige and all semblance of control in our public affairs. With the election of Grant the pendulum began to swing the other way, and during the last seven years it has moved with such momentum that we have witnessed a condition never dreamed of by those wise framers of our Constitution, who declared so often that the three branches should be forever kept separate and distinct.

Now, the House of Representatives, coming directly from the people by popular vote, has under the rules adopted by its Members degenerated into little more than a recording machine to do the will of the Speaker and his lieutenants. Freedom of debate in the old and true sense has disappeared from that end of the Capitol and measures of the greatest importance are jammed through almost without discussion under the Reed rules under conditions which to say the least are discreditable. In the Senate a hardly less disgraceful condition exists. Servility and cowardice are the order of the day. Freedom of debate still obtains, but the shadow of the Executive hangs over all and the President's wishes are almost the only law. There is some show of resistance on matters affecting the multimillionaires and the great corporations. The President writes scolding messages and makes inflammatory speeches appealing to the unthinking and ignorant masses. He has the potent influence of the press at his command; he has used the newspapers and magazines in exploiting what he calls "my policies" with a skill and daring that compel admiration. With bated breath Senators denounce his radical ideas in private and oppose in every possible way the measures which he clamors for by the passive resistance of nonaction. No one of the dominant party dares lift his voice in opposition or denunciation, but the Executive influence is the only influence in evidence while the Senate cowers in silent resistance. The two-thirds majority in the Senate belonging to the President's party which the people of the country have sent to Washington is so different from the larger majority which hectored and tyrannized over Andrew Johnson, spitting on him with contempt and only stopping short of treading him into the mire, that the historian of the future must necessarily consider the reason of the contrast. Looking about to find the causes which have produced this remarkable revolution within the brief span of one man's life, seeking to discover the cause of the dangerous growth of the executive branch of the Government at the expense of the legislative, we find the explanation is easy.

The Constitution lodges the power of appointment in the hands of the President, and the immense patronage of the office, amounting to millions and millions of dollars, has furnished an instrumentality with which to coerce Senators and Congressmen to acquiesce and yield obedience to the Executive will. The theory that the Senate must "advise and consent" before appointments are made is of little or no moment when Senators show such want of courage and self-respect and bow submissively to the orders from the White House. The members of the minority party are, of course, largely ignored. Appointments in the South, where the Democracy retains control, are in the hands of "referees," who fill the offices for the sole purpose of maintaining political machines. The Senators of the dominant party are afraid to resist the Executive will, lest they themselves should fail to obtain the patronage of their States. This condition is aggravated by the dread of Republican Senators lest the popularity of the President with the people shall force them into retirement if they resist the behests from the White House. When a clash between Senators or Members of the House has come, the people have sided with the President in almost every instance, and the fear of retirement from office through Presidential influence enables Mr. Roosevelt to pursue the policy of hectoring and domineering, which are the strongest features of his character. But these conditions, however deplorable, are the results of cause traceable directly to the people themselves. The same political machine which placed the President in the White House has sent the 61 Republican Senators to this Chamber and the 249 Republican Members to the House. The "Grand Old Party" of Lincoln, Grant, and McKinley holds absolute sway, because the people have willed it so, and when Mr. Roosevelt indulges in his tirades on the stump against the abuses which are evident to all he never stops to tell the people that all these things have come about with Republican Presidents in the White House and Republican Congresses in control.

The people, poor simple souls, reading the special pleas and sophistical excuses of Republican editors are led to think the President alone is honest and patriotic. They believe religiously that the Senate is corrupt and the House debauched, and that the policies—"my policies"—which are so exploited in the press must prevail and become law before any relief can be obtained. Senators who do not agree with the Executive and who refuse to obey his will must be retired. Congressmen who resist Executive dictation must be replaced by those who will obey. The Republican masses must understand, however, that they themselves have nominated and elected the legislatures which have chosen Senators who are charged with corruption, and voted for Representatives in Congress who have shown themselves so unwilling or unable to cope with conditions and who are charged by the very men who voted for them with being the servile tools of "predatory wealth."

But if the Republican machines of the various States, dominated as they are by the favored classes who have grown rich under Republican rule, are expected to send purer and better men under Roosevelt's orders than they have sent heretofore, the people must realize that they themselves are expected to do the work. It all resolves itself at last into the question whether there is enough honesty, patriotism, and true Americanism left in the Republican machine to purify itself, and can the people expect the relief which they have a right to demand until they shall turn the rascals out and place in office men who will represent them rather than the special interests which have been created by Republican class legislation.

The machinery of Government in the hands of the Northern masses has drifted under the control of the men who are guilty of the wrongs and infamies which Mr. Roosevelt denounces in such scathing terms. If you ask who passes the laws which are so defective, the answer is, The Republicans in Congress. If you ask who failed to pass the laws so necessary to remedy all these evils, the answer is, The Republican Congress. The people have been betrayed by those for whom they voted, and the remedy lies with the people and the people alone. The public conscience has been debauched by favoritism in Government in the interest of these very "predatory rich" who are so vigorously denounced by the President. The poor fools who are shouting his praises have so far failed to understand that the bad government which the Republican party has given the country is due solely to the ignorance and debauchery of the people. Misled and deceived by the newspapers which are owned by these same rich men labor organized and disorganized trails along behind the banner of Republicanism and shouts for Roosevelt and his policies. The millions who have been robbed are equally as enthusiastic as the millionaires who have been benefited. The capacity of the people to govern themselves wisely and protect their interests is seriously called in question by existing conditions.

The money gained by dishonest and unfair methods is used to control the machinery of nomination at Chicago. The price of negro delegates in the South rises day by day. The office-holding clique, manipulated and directed by a high official of the Government under Roosevelt's sanction and orders and reenforced by the millions in the hands of the relatives and friends of one of the candidates, is opposed in the struggle for the control of these Southern delegations by beneficiaries of Republican misgovernment who want to be left alone in the enjoyment of power and the benefits to their private fortunes which the existing conditions afford. It is a battle between predatory wealth on both sides, with the power and prestige of the President thrown into the balance in behalf of his favorite. Civil-service rules, "pernicious activity" of Government officials, bold and unblushing effort to dictate his successor in the White House or compel his own renomination for a third term are conspicuous factors of the situation. The necessity for keeping the negro vote in line compels the President to seek permission from Congress to annul his own deliberate action in regard to the Brownsville rioters. Having declared they were "out and would stay out" and that Congress need not bother itself about it, we are now asked in his latest message which has come to us, to pass a law which will enable the President to reinstate them when he shall become satisfied that they are innocent of the murderous assault upon the people of Brownsville.

In the mad rush to placate the negro vote we may expect to see before the Chicago convention meets, to quote a great New England newspaper, "the President reviewing the reenlisted negro battalion on the White House green, after which there will be luncheon at the Executive Mansion." The President's action in that matter was hasty and unjust, inasmuch as the innocent were punished along with the guilty, but it is a pitiable spectacle, all the same, to see the mad race for negro votes and the efforts to secure the Southern delegations to the Chicago convention.

Turning from this aspect of the case, let us consider some of the facts known of all men which can not be ignored in making up a judgment as to the President's shortcomings and responsibilities. Mr. Roosevelt is always loud-mouthed and even vehement in the proclamation of his own purity of purpose and patriotism. He has absolute faith in his own infallibility, and is apparently so drunk with power that he unconsciously lapses into the imperial "we" and sends cablegrams about "me and my people." But these things are of small moment—"vagaries of a noble and impetuous spirit"—and we could pass them by were it not for the existence of cold-blooded facts to show Executive responsibility for many of the evils which exist without dispute. The President clamors for changes in some old laws and enactment of new ones. The people, fretted and angry because of the wrongs to which they have been subjected, clamor with him. Some of these proposed changes are undoubtedly very desirable and necessary, but others appear to me to be most pernicious and dangerous. But of what use will it be to carry out these recommendations if the Executive himself fails to enforce the laws when enacted? If it be said there is no doubt but what he will do so, I point you to flagrant instances in which he has failed to enforce the laws we have and to assert that he should first compel obedience to the laws on the statute books before he asks for new statutes.

Here let me direct attention to the skill with which the President evades responsibility for abuses which he could correct under existing law, while at the same time arousing people almost to frenzy by his denunciation of them. I will give you a brief catalogue of the sins of omission and commission on the part of the Executive.

It is an old matter and it has been talked of here so often that I dislike to bring it up. Nevertheless, it stands as a glaring illustration of the accusations I am making or the indictment I am presenting. It is thoroughly well known that Paul Morton, as vice-president of the Santa Fe Railroad, in the rebate cases, laid himself open to indictment and liability to personal punishment, but the President peremptorially refused to permit Messrs. Judson and Harmon to prosecute, and Morton, then in the Cabinet, received a testimonial from both the Attorney-General and the President. Had the Executive been honest with himself and the people when he found a malefactor of great wealth in his own council, he would have acted like Cato and pressed the law to the limit regardless of the person.

Again, he approved, without a suggestion of opposition, the Elkins law, which had repealed the personal-punishment clause of the Sherman Act, and while the statute was reenacted in the rate bill, in no instance has it ever been pressed by the Executive to a successful issue or the imprisonment of a single malefactor been brought about under it.

Proclaiming the popular doctrine of having the Interstate Commerce Commission clothed with power to grant relief and fix a just and reasonable rate he surrendered to the railroad interests when victory was in his grasp, and the courts by injunction are left free to paralyze the orders of the Commission whenever they see fit.

He has favored in messages in the past, and we are told by the newspapers, will urge in the near future such changes in existing laws as will enable the railroads to make pooling contracts. He clamors against the oppression of combined capital while asking Congress to legalize it. If he has his way, we will soon see in this country such combinations as will produce the practical consolidation of all the railroads of the country.

In order to give the President's view of this matter, I quote from that famous message of January 31, which caused such a flutter in this Chamber and outside of it:

> In this connection I desire to repeat my recommendation that railways be permitted to form traffic associations for the purpose of conferring about and agreeing upon rates, regulations, and practices affecting interstate business in which the members of the association are mutually interested. This does not mean that they should be given the right to pool their earnings or their traffic. The law requires that rates shall be so adjusted as not to discriminate between individuals, localities, or different species of traffic. Ordinarily, rates by all competing lines must be the same. As applied to practical conditions, the railway operations of this country can not be conducted according to law without what is equivalent to conference and agreement. The articles under which such associations operate should be approved by the Commission; all their operations should be open to public inspection; and the rates, regulations, and practices upon which they agree should be subject to disapproval by the Commission.

In that same message, while pointing out the wrongs and burdens imposed on the people by overcapitalization, he, in effect, gives sanction to the past misdeeds of such men as Harriman, Morgan, et al., and would have the people submit to an "unnecessary and everlasting tax" because of the "innocent stockholders"—the dupes who have bought these watered stocks.

Again I quote, because I want to be entirely just and let the indictment, if I am making an indictment—I am merely using some plain-spoken comments—go to those who shall find my speech buried in the Congressional RECORD, along with what I have to say by way of accusation.

The President said:

> The Interstate Commerce Commission should be provided with the means to make a physical valuation of any road as to which it deems this valuation necessary. In some form the Federal Government should exercise supervision over the financial operations of our interstate railroads. In no other way can justice be done between the private owners of those properties and the public which pay their charges. When once an inflated capitalization has gone upon the market and has become fixed in value, its existence must be recognized. As a practical matter it is then often absolutely necessary to take account of the thousands of innocent stockholders who have purchased their stock in good faith. The usual result of such inflation is therefore to impose upon the public an unnecessary but everlasting tax, while the innocent purchasers of the stock are also harmed and only a few speculators are benefited. Such wrongs when once accomplished can with difficulty be undone; but they can be prevented with safety and with justice. When combinations of interstate railways must obtain Government sanction; when it is no longer possible for an interstate railway to issue stocks or bonds, save in the manner provided by the Federal Government; when that Government makes sure that the proceeds of every stock and bond issue go into the improvement of the property and not the enrichment of some individual or syndicate; when, whenever it becomes material for guidance in the regulative action of the Government, the physical value of one of these properties is determined and made known—there will be eliminated from railroad securities that element of uncertainty which lends to them their speculative quality and which has contributed much to the financial stress of the recent past.

I pause here long enough, Mr. President, to direct attention to the fact that when the rate bill was under discussion in this body the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] presented an amendment providing for the valuation of the railroads as a fundamental basis and necessary precedent to any effort on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine what was a just and reasonable rate. Did Mr. Roosevelt then send down any of these flamboyant messages urging us to take that necessary action? No, not one word. He was silent—dumb as an oyster. Now we are told that it may be necessary or that power ought to be granted to the Commission to make an appraisement of such property when in their judgment it is necessary.

I simply ask you as sensible men how you can undertake to say what is a reasonable dividend on railroad stocks and bonds unless you know whether those railroad stocks and bonds represent actual value or water? You are trying to lift yourself over the fence by your boot straps. No wonder the President receives such indorsement for his pretended earnest desire to see overcapitalization stopped! The country is flooded to-day with seven or eight billions of dollars of watered stock, and this message which I have just read, if it means anything, means that past misdeeds must go unchallenged; that the watered stock must be let alone for the benefit of the "innocent stockholders," the lambs, who have been seduced into the stock-gambling dens of Wall street; that the masses of the people, the business interests, must contribute of their hard-earned money to furnish dividends upon the face value of watered stocks.

In the same category of "keeping the words of promise to the ear and breaking them to the hope," if the newspapers are to be believed, he is even now planning a truce with these same rich "malefactors" and is ready to grant amnesty to all past trust offenders. In the most pronounced language he has denounced the combinations between labor organizations and the boycott, but on the eve of an election panders to this same vote by demanding changes in the law as interpreted by the Supreme Court. Organized labor is to be relieved from the prohibition of the Supreme Court's decision, but along with it must go the relief of capital, as is suggested by Mr. Roosevelt.

Once relieved, the "malefactors of great wealth" will combine and consolidate, the big ones will swallow the little ones, until we have one railroad system, or, at best, three railroad systems, with three multimillionaires or semibillionaires in control, while the people hurrah and rush madly after this last patriot. But, as I said, we were told in yesterday morning's newspaper that a very important conference was held at the White House between the President, the Attorney-General, and Messrs. Knox and Neill, and orders went forth that those three—not the President, but the three underlings—if I may apply such a term to the Attorney-General, are to prepare bills to be sent here to be introduced and passed at this session. What has become of the skill in lawmaking of the leaders of the Republican party that they are not fit to prepare such bills? Who is going to be the spaniel messenger to bring these bills from His Excellency and introduce them here for us to obey the orders from the White House? I am going to watch to see.

I want to warn organized labor that if it shall be seduced into believing that it will get relief from a law as laid down by the Supreme Court, it had better get the relief before the pooling bill passes, because, when once it shall come to pass that predatory wealth in the shape of the railroad octopus has gotten the permission of this Congress to combine, to consolidate, labor may whistle for its relief.

There are so many instances, Mr. President, of neglect of plain duty by the Executive in dealing with public affairs, in allowing plain statutes to be overridden, and the rights of the people to be ignored that I hesitate to prolong the catalogue. One very pronounced instance occurs to me for the moment. One of the striking features in the present Administration has been the setting apart of the public domain for forest reserves. We have been told in season and out of season that the lumber supply of this great country was on the verge of being exhausted, and that it was absolutely necessary to protect the forests in the interest of future generations. What have the President and his friends to say to the fact that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to-day holds 2,000,000 acres of the finest forest land in the world under the grant to the Oregon and California Railroad Company, which would be forfeited if the laws were enforced and the land could be restored to actual settlement? That gigantic corporation, presided over by "my dear Mr. Harriman," has ignored the plain letter of the statute granting those lands to its predecessor—I mean the predecessor of the Southern Pacific—which required that they should be sold in not exceeding 160-acre lots to actual settlers at $2.50 an acre. The road, according to the report of the Attorney-General which was sent in here a couple of weeks ago, has benefited, I believe, to the extent of $8,000,000 or more in the sale of that land, and still holds 2,000,000 acres.

It is true that at last the Department of Justice is moving in the courts to see what will be the outcome of this lawlessness on the part of Harriman and the Southern Pacific, but nothing is being done about the Northern Pacific. There are millions of acres of public domain withheld from sale contrary to the terms of the grant, and actual settlers who want to buy and make a home are refused any consideration. Nothing is being done by the Executive in these other grants affecting the public domain which are held by these corporations, much of the land the most valuable in the West, with timber the finest on the globe. We shall see what we shall see later.

Before I pass on to the main subject that I shall discuss to-day—something relating to the finances, by the way—I want to say, Mr. President, in all solemnity, and if it were the last utterance of my life I would tell the American people, that the one national necessity of this day and time is the election of a Democratic President and Congress. Why? To enable the Republican majority in this body, intrenched as it is for at least four years, in spite of any whirlwind or revolution that may come, to prevent any radical or dangerous thing being done—to allow that Republican majority to substitute a backbone for the cotton string which grows up and down the spine of you gentlemen.

I want to come now, Mr. President, to a concrete instance of the President's shortcomings as a law enforcer, the most flagrant of all of the Executive neglects, a running sore and cancer on the body politic, hated by all good citizens and denounced by even the President himself, who anathematized it in bitter language in the celebrated message of January 31. Again, in trying to be entirely fair, I read from page 9 of the message:

I do not know whether is is possible, but if possible, it is certainly desirable, that in connection with measures to restrain stock watering and overcapitalization there should be measures taken to prevent at least the grosser forms of gambling in securities and commodities, such as making large sales of what men do not possess and "cornering" the market. Legitimate purchases of commodities and of stocks and securities for investment have no connection whatever with purchases of stocks or other securities or commodities on a margin for speculative and gambling purposes. There is no moral difference between gambling at cards or in lotteries or on the race track and gambling in the stock market. One method is just as pernicious to the body politic as the other in kind, and in degree the evil worked is far greater. But it is a far more difficult subject with which to deal. The great bulk of the business transacted on the exchanges is not only legitimate, but is necessary to the working of our modern industrial system, and extreme care would have to be taken not to interfere with this business in doing away with the "bucket shop" type of operation.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand copies of three sections of the Revised Statutes, which, if enforced, would to a large degree do away with stock gambling. The President says, if it is possible, it is desirable to have it done. He has not told Messrs. Neill and Garfield and the other headlights of legislation who are preparing bills for us to pass to look for any remedy for this pernicious and devilish practice; but he failed to see or is unwilling to try to enforce the law he now has, to which his attention has been directed, and which, if enforced, as I said a moment ago, would undoubtedly do away with the greater part of this abuse. In this connection, Mr. President, I will send to the desk and have read a copy of a letter sent to the President upon March 4, 1908. I can not at the moment put my hand on the letter. I have so much ammunition here that I have not got it in shape to shoot it like a Gatling gun, but I will shoot it after a while. [Laughter.] I now have the letter I was looking for, which is dated March 30, 1907. I ask that it be read from the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, March 30, 1907.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I trust you will not make any further statement as to your attitude toward the railway situation, for I believe the great majority of the people—those engaged in legitimate lawful business pursuits—heartily support your course.

Those who clamor so for a statement are the speculators who have created the conditions about which they so loudly complain. They have been arrogant, grasping, violators of law, and should be compelled to obey the law to the last letter as completely as the humblest citizen.

As Mr. Carnegie says, "A few gamblers in Wall street are the trouble," and "Wall street is not America." He is entirely right in this statement, except that there are many instead of few gamblers or speculators on Wall street, and these include the men most prominent in banking and business affairs, as well as the men and women who put up a margin of $100 to speculate in stock.

The truth is that speculation in stock is made too easy by the banks in New York City, which lend their credit in great volume to stock brokers.

And so far as the national banks here are concerned this credit is habitually furnished in plain violation of the national banking laws.

The credits granted to stock brokers by national and State banks in New York City will frequently aggregate $200,000,000 in a day's business. Much of this represents legitimate and necessary transactions in stocks and bonds, but much is purely speculation on margins. But whether legitimate or speculative these two transactions should be made strictly within the lawful limits of the national banking law, and this is not the case.

I do not wish any notoriety in this connection, but I am prepared, if necessary, to substantiate my statement in detail.

For twelve years I held responsible positions in the Comptroller of Currency's office, so I am very familiar with the requirements of the national bank act, and for over eight years I have had the experience of banking on Wall street.

With my very best wishes that you may have continual strength and courage faithfully to serve the public welfare, I am,

Yours, respectfully, GEO. M. COFFIN.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I will simply take time enough to say that Mr. George M. Coffin was formerly a clerk in the Comptroller's office, was promoted to Deputy Comptroller, went to New York, and, like many other officials from that Bureau, became associated with a bank and was made president or vice-president of a bank over there. Without taking further time, I will simply ask permission to incorporate some testimonials from the various Comptrollers of the Currency under whom he served as to his qualifications and character. I do not want them read unless somebody attacks him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection the matter referred to by the Senator from South Carolina will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Extracts from letters as to the ability and character of Mr. Coffin, president of the Geo. M. Coffin and Parshall Company, public accountants and auditors, 115 Broadway, New York City.

Hon. W. L. Trenholm, Comptroller of Currency, 1886–1889—July 2, 1889:

"Your long training and experience in business before you came to Washington give you an immense advantage. It enabled you to take hold at once and conduct ably from the first moment the important divisions of the bureau which were successively placed under your control."

Hon. E. S. Lacey, Comptroller of Currency, 1889–1892, now president Bankers' National Bank, Chicago, Ill., June 25, 1892:

"In the discharge of the responsible duties devolved upon me during the past three years I have relied greatly upon your skill and fidelity and have never been disappointed."

Hon. A. B. Hepburn, Comptroller of Currency, 1892–1893, now president Chase National Bank, New York City, March 12, 1896:

"Accept my congratulations upon your well-deserved promotion (Deputy Comptroller). It ought to have come long ago, and I am very glad that Comptroller Eckels has done you justice, and at the same time done the banks under your supervision and the public service a favor in securing for them so good an executive."

Hon. James H. Eckels, Comptroller of Currency, 1893–1898, afterwards president Commercial National Bank, Chicago, Ill., February 16, 1898:

"I can not speak too highly of Mr. Coffin. He is a man of the highest integrity and the most faithful attention to duty. He, as chief of the reports division, was compelled to display a great deal of executive ability and look after the examiners who were examining the banks. I always found him a man of the utmost good judgment and of decisiveness whenever that was required."

Hon. Charles G. Dawes, Comptroller of Currency, 1898–1901, now president Central Trust Company, Chicago, Ill., August 8, 1898:

"I want to say that Mr. Coffin is a man of the highest tact, ability, discretion, and honesty. Should he leave the Treasury Department, we will experience a great loss. I write an unsolicited testimonial of my friend, Mr. Coffin, for whom I have come to entertain a high regard, as have those of my predecessors with whom he has served."

Hon. W. Dudley Foulke, Richmond, Ind., April 14, 1900:

"I regard him as a man of skill and of the highest character. I think, indeed, that his ability to deal with difficult financial problems is extraordinary."

Mr. TILLMAN. Section 5200, to which Mr. Coffin called the President's attention, and that a year ago, reads as follows:

SEC. 5200 (as amended June 22, 1906). The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association, actually paid in and unimpaired and one-tenth part of its unimpaired surplus fund: Provided, however, That the total of such liabilities shall in no event exceed 30 per cent of the capital stock of the association. But the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, and the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same shall not be considered as money borrowed.

This, including the surplus, was under the act of June 22, 1906, which was passed at the instance of our friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. ALDRICH]. Here is a direct prohibition under the law that these national banking associations shall not lend to any individual or firm more than one-tenth of their capital stock and of their undivided surplus. How are you going to enforce that? Before I read the enforcing clause I will read section 5208, which deals with the other aggravated method or instrumentality by which stock gambling is fostered and encouraged and kept alive. Section 5208 reads:

It shall be unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any national banking association to certify any check drawn upon the association unless the person or company drawing the check has on deposit with the association, at the time such check is certified, an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check. Any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against the association; but the act of any officer, clerk, or agent of any association, in violation of this section, shall subject such bank to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller as provided for in section 5234.

Which simply means that the Comptroller under the law has the power and is required to institute proceedings in the circuit or district courts of the United States to close up such institutions when they break this section. But there is still another punitive clause much worse than the mere closing of the association and putting it out of business. Section 5239 reads:

If the directors of any national banking association shall knowingly violate, or knowingly permit any of the officers, agents, or servants of the association to violate, any of the provisions of this title, all the rights, privileges, and franchises of the association shall be thereby forfeited. Such violation shall, however, be determined and adjusted by a proper circuit, district, or Territorial court of the United States, in a suit brought for that purpose by the Comptroller of the Currency, in his own name, before the association shall be declared dissolved.

Here is a law with teeth in it. Section 13 of the act of July 12, 1882, provides—

That any officer, clerk, or agent of any national banking association who shall willfully violate the provisions of an act entitled "An act in reference to certifying checks by national banks," approved March 3, 1869, being section 5208 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or who shall resort to any device or receive any fictitious obligation, direct or collateral, in order to evade the provisions thereof, or who shall certify checks before the amount thereof shall have been regularly entered to the credit of the dealer upon the books of the banking association, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, on conviction thereof in any circuit or district court of the United States, be fined not more than $5,000, or shall be imprisoned not more than five years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

It is this section under which John R. Walsh was at last started to the penitentiary; but John R. Walsh had broken these other sections, namely, 5200 and 5208, probably a thousand times within the positive knowledge of the Comptroller of the Currency that he was breaking them before he was brought to book, and nothing but the disaster which followed from his lack of business judgment and disobedience to sound banking principles ever produced the catastrophe which caused the bank over which he presided to be declared bankrupt and put in liquidation.

How is this devilment carried out? I have here a brief from the court of appeals of the State of New York in which the method is outlined in full. I do not want to take the time to read it, but I will ask permission to incorporate an extract from it as a part of my remarks, and I will merely summarize it in what I shall say. Mr. President, may I have permission to have it incorporated in the RECORD?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extract from brief, court of appeals.]

The bank during the running of this account had been in the habit of giving the old firm a credit in said account of $75,000 in the morning, which the employees, who were witnesses, called a "temporary loan," which was expected to be paid off in the afternoon, and against this credit, if there was not in the account a sufficient credit balance brought over from the previous day, the bank certified the checks of the old firm which were presented early in the morning. At the beginning of the transactions between the old firm and the bank a printed blank stock note, which was put in evidence as Exhibit 29, was made and had been retained by the bank until produced at the trial. As is apparent from an inspection of this exhibit, no date, rate of interest, or collateral is mentioned, and but two of the numerous blanks in it are filled, one being the amount "$75,000" and the other being the signature of the old firm, and yet upon this piece of paper, which was never canceled, surrendered, nor renewed, but was kept in the bank's vaults as a continuing note, with no collateral security for it other than any possible excess of collateral which the bank might be holding at the time upon other specific loans to the firm, and without any entry in the bank's books of the terms of the loans, it is conceded that these daily credits or loans of $75,000 were given or made by the bank.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is along this line. The broker or gambler, knowing in the morning how much he will have to pay for his preceding day's work on account of the stocks he has bought the day before, and not having the money on hand, goes to the bank and gives a bogus note, or an actual note, without collateral—a dummy note, so to speak The bank officer accepts that and charges it to his credit and certifies his check, so that the broker may go on the stock exchange and buy more stocks for that day, and the process is repeated over and over and over again. The pirate—if I may call a stock gambler a pirate—the pirate will take his gun, his blunderbuss, his pistol, or his cutlass and go after you hammer and tongs and demand your money or your life, and leave you a chance to fight; but the stock-gambling pirate sneaks around, and lambs from the country, from the West, the South, and elsewhere, are tolled into the stock exchange by flaming reports made day by day of the rise and fall in values and the immense fortunes which are possible, and they are the fellows who are fleeced through the instrumentality of the broker and of the bank, the bank furnishing the means, the broker being the instrument, and the stocks and bonds being bought on ficticious checks, which have no backing, no collateral, and nothing but trust in the honor and character of the broker to support them, and the law is trampled under foot. At 3 o'clock that evening the gambler goes to the bank with the stocks and bonds which he has bought that day and deposits them as collateral for his preceding day's work and to make good the checks which have been furnished him in the morning.

I have read the statute prohibiting this—section 5208. The Comptrollers of the Currency from 1888 down have time and again reported against these excessive loans, more than one-tenth, and against the certification of bogus checks or checks without collateral. The attention of the President was called to it. The Comptroller of the Currency has had his attention called to it. The President blandly says that "if it is possible to stop it, it ought to be done."

With the permission of the Senate I will incorporate such other evidence in the shape of exhibits as will make clear the process and make clear the results.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TOLD ROOSEVELT HOW TO CHECK STOCK GAMBLING—BY SIMPLY ENFORCING SECTIONS 5200 AND 5208 OF THE REVISED STATUTES OF THE UNITED STATES, WHICH, GEORGE M. COFFIN WROTE HIM, ARE DAILY VIOLATED BY EVERY LARGE NATIONAL BANK—BUT ADMINISTRATION HAS TAKEN NO ACTION—SOME INTERESTING LETTERS WHICH PASSED BETWEEN BANK PRESIDENT COFFIN AND COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY RIDGELY SHOW CORRESPONDENCE ENDED ABRUPTLY WHEN WAY TO ENFORCE THOSE LAWS WAS INDICATED.

Since the World printed, last January 7, its now famous editorial against stock gambling and urging the employment of repressive measures against the evil the Wagner bill has been introduced in the State legislature, making it a crime to deal in securities on margins.

President Roosevelt in his message to Congress January 31, following the exposures in the World, denounced stock gambling. The President said in his message:

"I do not know whether it is possible, but if possible, it is certainly desirable that in connection with measures to restrain stock watering and overcapitalization there should be measures taken to prevent at least the grosser forms of gambling in securities and commodities, such as making large sales of what men do not possess and 'cornering' the market. * * *"

NO MORAL DIFFERENCE.

"There is no moral difference between gambling at cards or in lotteries or on the race track and gambling in the stock market. One method is just as pernicious to the body politic as the other in kind, and in degree the evil worked is far greater. * * *

"But if it is possible to devise a way to deal with it the effort should be made, even if only in a cautious and tentative way. It would seem that the Federal Government could at least act by forbidding the use of the mails, telegraph and telephone wires for mere gambling in stocks and futures, just as it does in lottery transactions."

If President Roosevelt is sincere in his desire to stop or check stock gambling George M. Coffin, former president of the Beaver National Bank, can not understand why he does not direct his Comptroller of the Currency, William Barret Ridgely, to enforce sections 5200 and 5208 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. President Roosevelt knows of the existence of these sections, and the fact that the whole structure of stock gambling rests on a continuous violation of them by practically every bank of importance in the down-town district of New York. Mr. Coffin wrote the President about these sections, of the fact that they were being daily violated, and he knows Mr. Roosevelt received his letter, for Comptroller of the Currency Ridgely wrote him saying that the President had turned Mr. Coffin's letter over to him.

VIOLATORS KNOWN.

Comptroller of the Currency Ridgely also knows of the existence of these sections and the fact that they are violated scores of times every business day in the year, and that his Department has never tried to enforce those laws or bring the violators to punishment. The facts were laid before him in a series of letters writen by Mr. Coffin. The World is enabled to print these letters and the letters written by Comptroller of the Currency Ridgely in reply.

This correspondence, which is presented below, makes a striking exhibit in view of the denunciatory character of the President's message on stock gambling. The day the message came out it was received with derision in Wall street, and with comments of this sort:

"The great American noise-maker is at it again."

"Just words; that's all."

That stock gambling can be suppressed and at least 80 per cent of it obliterated by a strict enforcement of sections 5200 and 5208 of the Revised Statutes is known, and has been known for years, by every bank president and almost by every bank employee down to the junior clerks, and also by the heads of all stock exchange brokerage houses, their managers, and clerks.

Section 5200 is a simple and lucid law. It limits the amount which a bank may loan to a single borrower to 10 per cent of the combined capital and surplus. If a bank has $1,000,000 capital and $1,000,000 surplus, or $2,000,000 in all, the maximum of the loans which it can have outstanding to the same borrower is $200,000.

Section 5208 prohibits overcertification. No national bank shall certify a check drawn by a depositor unless there is actually on deposit to the credit of that depositor an amount at least as great as that called for by the check.

FINE AND IMPRISONMENT.

Violation of either of these laws is punishable by fine and imprisonment. Just how these laws are violated every day without interference by the Comptroller of the Currency, and just how at least 80 per cent of the daily transactions of the New York Stock Exchange are absolutely dependent on violations of these laws, is shown in the correspondence between Mr. Coffin and the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. Coffin is probably the best-informed banker on the Federal banking laws in this city. He served twelve years in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency at Washington as Chief of the Division of Issue, as Chief of the Reports Division, which gave him supervision of the United States bank examiners, and as Deputy Comptroller. In 1898 he became vice-president of the Phenix National Bank in this city, and in March, 1907, president of the Beaver National Bank. Ill health compelled him to resign that position in July, four months later. Mr. Coffin and Comptroller Ridgely have always been warm personal friends.

The correspondence follows:

NEW YORK, July 11, 1906.

DEAR MR. RIDGELY: I believe your expressed intention to require the banks to live up to the letter of the new law in the matter of excessive loans will have the moral support of the great majority of directors, who are giving more attention to such matters than ever before.

MADE MORE LIBERAL.

And now that the question has been decided by the will of Congress, and that the law has been made more liberal, there ought to be, and I believe there will be, cheerful and general obedience to the law. In cases where there is still a disposition to violate or evade the law it has recently occurred to me the following argument might be used with good effect.

Every director every year takes an oath before a notary that he "will not knowingly violate or willingly permit to be violated any of the provisions of this title;" so that when any director joins in authorizing a loan in excess of the legal limit, or a director who is an executive officer makes such a loan, or willingly permits it to be made, he violates his oath.

Directors are doing a great deal of thinking these days, and such an argument coming from the Comptroller would, I think, carry great weight and be very effective.

Perhaps you have already used this argument, but in any event I beg to offer this as a suggestion for what it may be worth.

GEORGE M. COFFIN.

Mr. Ridgely's reply was prompt:

WASHINGTON, July 12, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. COFFIN: Your favor of the 11th instant is received. I am very much obliged to you for it, and for the suggestion you make, which is very much along the lines of what we are beginning to do in such cases.

I find that the efforts I have made for a year or two past to call the attention of the directors to the details and management of the banks have had a very salutary effect and resulted in investigations, which generally have an immediate and beneficial effect on bank management.

WM. BARRET RIDGELY.

JULY 13, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. RIDGELY: I have your letter of 12th instant, and note what you say.

The success of your past efforts in enforcing the plain provisions of the law ought to be very gratifying to you and encourage you for the future. You had to meet conditions created by the laxity of your predecessors. So far as my influence went in a subordinate capacity, I always maintained that it was the Comptroller's plain duty to enforce the law as he found it, but in the matter of excessive loans my chiefs never agreed with this view. Having been in the office and out of it, I realize fully how potent is the Comptroller's influence, and, wisely and lawfully used, it can accomplish wonders.

Just now, as no doubt you know, there is a great deal of introspection and self-examination going on in the seats of the mighty, and this is the psychological moment for insisting on obedience to law. Anything done in this direction will have the hearty support of a wholesome public opinion.

My continued interest in the Comptroller's office causes me to wish that the examiners' service was more effective than it really is. There are violations of law which only they can discover that, so far as I know, are never criticised by your office. But of these I would not care to write, preferring when I next have the pleasure of meeting you to discuss them orally. With best wishes and kind regards,

GEO. M. COFFIN.

WASHINGTON, July 14, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. COFFIN: I have received your letter of the 13th and read it with much interest. I shall always be glad to have any suggestions you can make in regard to the relations of this office with banks, and hope that you will feel free to write me fully at any time.

WM. BARRET RIDGELY.

NEW YORK, July 18, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. RIDGELY: Your letter of 14th instant has been duly received, in which you kindly say you will be glad to have any suggestion I may have to make, and as I do not know how soon I shall have the pleasure of meeting you I have concluded to write what I had in mind.

The violation of law to which I referred in my letter of 16th instant are those growing out of the certfication or acceptance of checks for brokers, and so far as I know are no more serious than violations of section 5200.

So far as I can ascertain these credits are granted daily on demand notes in regular form, proceeds of which are duly placed to credit of the broker making the notes, and against these credits checks are certified or accepted. As a rule the notes are sent in around 10 o'clock in the morning, and by 3 or 3.30 p. m. deposits are made, against which the demand notes are charged and the loans liquidated.

These loans bear no interest, yet so far as the bank making them is concerned they involve all the risks attaching to loans without any security whatever (as a rule) except the personal integrity and business judgment of the borrowers. While a loss is rare, when it does come it is for a large amount, as in the case of the Seventh National Bank a few years ago.

TAKE SUCH RISKS.

Of course, if bank managers wish to take such risks the responsibility is theirs, but they should be incurred within the limitations of law. Regarded strictly as loans, they should be made within the limits of section 5200, and I can see no reason why they should be exempt.

As a matter of fact and reality these transactions involve a lending of credit by the banks to their customers which the courts have declared to be unlawful. But the custom has persisted so long and such large interests are involved that my suggestions go no further than confining these so-called loans to the limits of section 5200. And now that the stock market is not very active, and we are on the eve of a crop movement, when it should not be active, I think the present time propitious to looking into the matter.

The only result will be to cause either a curtailment of these credits, which, in my opinion, would be wholesome, or to cause a shifting of these accounts from smaller banks to larger ones. At any rate the lesson of obedience to law in this respect would have a salutary effect on the business community.

My observation, since I have been in Wall street and know how things are done, is that banking funds are used entirely too freely for speculative purposes to the detriment of the legitimate business interests of the country, and clearing-house and other figures support this view.

All the machinery of banking is furnished to make speculation easy. The margin customer of the broker puts up 10 per cent of the stock bought, the broker puts up 10 per cent more to make the bank margin of 20 per cent, and the banks holding largely of the reserve funds of other banks furnish the remaining 80 per cent. New York City must be the great market for stocks and bonds, but the banks should not aid and abet speculation in violation of law.

On November 9, 1905, checks certified or accepted by national and State banks in the Wall street district aggregated nearly $200,000,000—nearly one-half the total exchanges of the next day, which were $400,000,000. Again in January and February, 1906, bank reports showed the same proportion. My interest in the national banking system and in the banking prestige of New York City leads me to lay this matter before you for your consideration.

If you think it worth looking into, I would suggest you make an investigation through your examiners here in the regular rounds of their visits. The violations never are shown in reports, because they always disappear before the close of business each day, but they exist nearly every day from the beginning of business until its close, in a form readily accessible to the bank examiners.

Unless it should be necessary I would prefer my name should not appear even to the examiners here in any investigation you make, for it might visit on me the animosity of great financial interests.

And if there is any point not made clear in this letter I shall be glad to supplement it at your request. As I have already said, the influence of the Comptroller with the Government behind him is immense, and I believe this is an opportunity where it can be exercised in a way most wholesome to the business interests of the country and, therefore, most creditably to your administration of the office.

GEO. M. COFFIN.

No answer came to this letter, which had specifically pointed out the violations that no Federal Administration has ever dared to stop since the stock exchange and Wall street became such tremendous financial and political powers. Mr. Coffin waited until July 25, and then wrote Deputy Comptroller T. P. Kane, asking him if Comptroller Ridgely had received his letter of July 18. On July 31 Mr. Kane wrote Mr. Coffin:

"The Comptroller was at the office during the period stated in your letter, and I understand replied to your letter."

GOT NO REPLY.

Mr. Coffin got no reply from Comptroller of the Currency Ridgely, and finally, March 30, 1907, wrote President Roosevelt. In this letter he referred to a statement made about that time by Andrew Carnegie that "a few gamblers in Wall street are in trouble." The letter to the President then said, referring to Mr. Carnegie:

"He is entirely right in this statement except that there are many instead of few gamblers or speculators in Wall street, and these include the men most prominent in banking and business affairs, as well as the men and women who put up a margin of $100 to speculate in stocks.

"The truth is that speculation in stocks is made too easy by the banks in New York City, which lend their credit in great volume to stock brokers.

"And so far as the national banks here are concerned, this credit is habitually furnished in plain violation of the national banking laws."

President Roosevelt handed this letter over to Comptroller of the Currency Ridgely, who answered it:

WASHINGTON, April 4, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. COFFIN: Your favor of the 30th instant, to the President, has been referred to me. I will be obliged if you will write me more specifically in what respect the national banking law is violated in the credits furnished stock brokers in New York City, and also make such suggestion as you may think advisable in regard to what ought to be done to correct the evil, if it exists.

Yours, very sincerely, WM. BARRETT RIDGELY.

NEW YORK, April 6, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. RIDGELY: Replying to your kind favor of the 4th instant, receipt of which I acknowledged yesterday, in which you request me to write you specifically in what respect the national banking laws are violated in the credits furnished stock brokers in New York City, and to make such suggestions as I may think advisable in regard to what ought to be done to correct the evil, if it exists.

NOT MORE FULLY.

I do not think I could present the matter more fully than I did in my letter of July 18, 1906, to you, a copy of which I herewith inclose. You may remember we had some correspondence at that time, and I do not know whether this last letter ever reached you, as I had no acknowledgment of it from you.

If I were able to add anything to what I said and suggested therein, I would present it as follows. It is a matter to which I have given a good deal of thought, and to my mind it presents itself in three aspects:

I. Section 5208, as you know, makes it unlawful for a bank to certify any check drawn upon it unless the drawer of the check has on deposit an amount equal to the amount of the check, and section 13, act July 12, 1882, makes such an act a misdemeanor and prescribes fine or imprisonment for any violation.

II. To evade the penalties prescribed by the above-cited sections, it is customary for banks granting certification to legalize these transactions by making them appear in the form of loans. These loans are represented by demand notes, bearing no interest and having no security except the name, reputation, and integrity of the makers of the notes.

In this view, any accommodations of this kind granted beyond the statutory limit of 10 per cent of capital and surplus of any bank is unquestionably a violation of section 5200. For instance, if a bank with $500,000 capital and $200,000 surplus grants a loan of $200,000 in this form to anybody it violates the provisions of section 5200, which limits the loan to $70,000.

Is there any reason why loans to brokers should be any exception to this prohibition of the law?

III. The certification or acceptance of checks drawn against such unsecured loans placed to the credit of a customer really amounts to the lending of its credit by the bank to such a customer, and in the case of Bowen v. Needles National Bank (94 Fed. Rep., 925), it was decided that a national bank has no such power; also in the case of Bowen v. Needles National Bank et al. (87 Fed. Rep., 430), it was decided that it is ultra vires on the part of a national bank to guarantee checks drawn on it by one having no funds deposited with the bank.

THE QUESTION.

The question here is: Does a customer who has the proceeds of a note without security and bearing no interest placed to his credit have funds deposited with the bank within the meaning of section 5208?

As to the way in which to go about the correction of this evil, if it exists, I have made suggestions in my letter of July 18, 1906, but I will write you further as to this as soon as I have the opportunity.

GEO. M. COFFIN.

No answer came to this letter.

NEW YORK, April 12, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. RIDGELY: I promised in my letter of the 6th instant to write you further on the subject of certification for stock brokers by the national banks here. As suggested in my letter of July 18, 1906, I should think the best way to take up the matter would be through the examiners here in the regular round of their work.

I have recently learned that one of your examiners here has resigned and presume that his place will be filled by a new one. It would be quite natural for the new examiner to look carefully into all the affairs of the banks here, and with a hint from you he might take up this subject specially and report his findings to you.

The examiner and his assistants are in any bank during the whole of a business day, and these transactions from beginning to end will be subject to their inspection in any bank in which they are undertaken.

TREATED AS LOANS.

They are usually treated as loans, so entered on the books, and are therefore readily accessible at any time to the examiner's inspection. If he finds any cases where section 5200 is violated, he can report them to your office, and this will give you the opportunity to criticise.

In this connection I would say that the work of an examiner here demands exceptional abilities, by reason of the tremendous interests and influences that are naturally at work in a great financial center like this. To cope with these forces the examiner ought to be a man of strong and unimpeachable character and undoubted ability as a banker and accountant.

While I have no criticism to make of the character of any examiner who has been in the service here during my stay in New York, I do not think they have exhibited the qualities of strength and thoroughness which the situation demands. I know of things overlooked that ought not to have been overlooked and of failures to carry out the ordinary printed instructions of your office which I myself prepared while in the office.

With this knowledge and conviction, I hope you will not consider me intrusive when I suggest that in selecting an examiner for the existing vacancy, if he is not already selected, you will bear in mind what I say. It is offered with a sincere desire to add to the efficiency of your excellent administration, and at the same time to bring the administration of the national banks of New York up to the highest level so far as it may be in your power to do this.

Yours, sincerely, GEO. M. COFFIN.

Again the Comptroller of the Currency failed to put himself on record in the matter of excessive loans to stockbrokers and overcertification of their checks.

NEW YORK, April 25, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. RIDGELY: As requested in your letter of the 4th instant, I wrote you with regard to certain matters on the 5th, 6th, and 12th instant, respectively, but so far have received no acknowledgment of any of these.

QUESTION OF DELIVERY.

Will you be good enough to drop me a line telling me whether or not the letters ever reached you, and oblige,

Yours, sincerely, GEO. M. COFFIN.

This brought a peculiar reply.

WASHINGTON, April 29, 1907.

MY DEAR MR. COFFIN: I have received your favor of the 25th instant in regard to the letters you wrote me relative to certain practices of the banks in New York.

I ask your pardon for not having formally acknowledged your letters, but expected to get time to investigate the law, etc., and write you fully in a few days and did not think it was necessary. I have been so rushed with other matters that I have not got down to this, but will write you further about it in a few days.

It does not strike me that this is a matter that a few days more or less will make any difference with.

Very sincerely, yours, WILLIAM BARRET RIDGELY.

Mr. Coffin acknowledged receipt of that letter by telling the Comptroller that as the practice had existed for forty years he presumed "a few days would not make any difference." Mr. Coffin ended the correspondence then and there and gave up hope of getting the Comptroller of the Currency to enforce the laws.

For those not familiar with the method of financing stock transactions by the stock-exchange brokers, it is said that no firm in the street—not the richest—has capital enough to pay for what its customers buy. A purchase of a thousand shares at 100 involves $100,000.

BROKER MUST PUT UP.

The customer may put up $10,000 as margin. The broker must put up the rest. He may furnish $10,000 out of his own resources and get the remaining $80,000 from the banks.

An active brokerage firm of moderate size deals in from 20,000 to 40,000 shares a day. A big firm, patronized by groups of big speculators, deals in 100,000 shares a day at times. In a bull market customers will stay "long" of a stock for days and weeks. Every day's trading at times requires fresh borrowing.

Every morning a brokerage house knows how much money it will be required to pay that day before 2.15 p. m., when the final deliveries of stock purchased the previous day are made. It may have to pay out $50,000, or as much as $500,000. It is the rule in Wall street to have all checks paid for stocks certified. A broker who pays out $50,000 or $500,000 in a day must see to it that his bank will certify his checks to that amount, even if his deposits do not amount to one-fifth of the sum required.

Up to the time the Seventh Ward Bank failed, eight years ago, it was the custom of all banks with stock brokers as customers to violate the overcertification section of the Revised Statutes of the United States without any pretense of legality. But President Kimball, of the Seventh Ward Bank, was fined $5,000 and stood a good chance of going to jail, and the other bank presidents became frightened.

A SUBTERFUGE.

They adopted a subterfuge by which a dummy deposit was placed to the credit of the borrower. This is the practice: A broker needing $200,000 sends notes to his bank early in the day for that amount. The bank goes through the form of discounting the notes and putting a fictitious credit of $200,000 to his account. When the checks the broker gives out during the day are presented at his bank they are certified. Then, later in the day, the broker puts in his own genuine deposits and the notes are canceled.

Without the banks acting as a bridge across which the buyer and seller of margined stocks may deal those transactions would be impossible. And to act as that bridge the banks break the United States laws every day in the year. It is profitable business for the banks. By keeping stock speculation going at high pressure constant employment for the banks' money is found and at better rates of interest than legitimate business can ordinarily afford to pay.

Any interference with this system would arouse the wrath of every important national bank in the city and the immense power of the New York Stock Exchange, which represents more wealth, perhaps, than any other institution in the world.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have here a résumé of former Comptrollers' reports coming down from 1888 when Mr. Trenholm was in the office to the present occupant of that office. They have all recommended legislation in regard to section 5200, and it is a matter of record that Mr. Ridgely, when the act of 1906 was passed, sent out a circular notifying the banks that he was going to enforce it. But all the same it has not been enforced. I ask that this be incorporated also as a part of the evidence which I am trying to bring forward here to show how stock gambling is conducted, the source of the money which is furnished the gamblers by the banks contrary to the law, and all that, so that those who want to find out can do so by studying the exhibits after they are printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RÉSUMÉ OF FORMER COMPTROLLERS' REPORTS.

An examination of all Comptrollers' reports from the year 1865, shows that while references to section 5200 were made and amendments thereof were suggested between 1868 and 1878 no Comptroller made any comments on the violation of this section until 1886 when Comptroller Trenholm called the attention of Congress to the matter and recommended an amendment of the law and penalties which would be likely to stop it. Trenholm renewed this recommendation in 1887 and in 1888, or every year of his administration and in 1888 says the law is "notoriously disregarded."

In 1888 Trenholm states that he has adopted the rule of sending notice to each director of a bank whose condition requires a letter to be addressed to the board.

Then Comptroller Lacey recommended amendment of section 5200 in 1889, 1891, and 1892 and also proposed restricting by law loans to officers and directors of national banks.

In 1893 Comptroller Eckels suggests restriction of loans to officers and directors and prints a copy of a letter he sent to directors with request for their united reply in cases where large accommodations were made to officers and directors.

In 1895 renews recommendation as to restricting loans to officers and directors.

In 1896 he gives "excessive loans" as one main cause of bank failures and renews recommendations as to restrictions of loans to officers and directors, and that directors should make one examination a year of their banks.

Comptroller Dawes in 1898 recommends amendments of section 5200 and states that on September 28, 1898, 1,124 banks, or one-third of the entire number of banks showed violation of this law in their sworn reports.

In 1899 he renews his recommendations and in 1900 renews them again, stating that on June 29, 1900, 1,575 banks out of 3,732 showed violations of section 5200 in their sworn reports.

Comptroller Ridgely (appointed October 1, 1901) in 1901 renewes Dawes's recommendations as to amending section 5200 and restricting loans to officers and directors, repeats that on June 29, 1900, over 40 per cent of the banks showed violations and says "it is therefore practically impossible to enforce a compliance with its requirements."

In 1905 he recommends amendment to section 5200 to make limit 10 per cent of capital and surplus, and this amendment became law on June 22, 1906.

Several Comptrollers say that never in a single instance had the penalty prescribed in section 5239 been enforced to stop the making of excessive loans, and Deputy Comptroller Kane, in a magazine article in December, 1903, says that the law (sec. 5200) is persistently violated and disregarded and that if the penalty (sec. 5239) were applied (in 1903) it would result in closing two-thirds of all the banks in the national system.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, one of the resolutions which has been read at the desk and to which I am speaking, the fourth one, says:

Fourth. The committee is further instructed to ascertain what, if any, legislation is necessary to discourage or prevent the habit of persons holding the office of Comptroller of the Currency or other Treasury officials from making their offices a stepping-stone to employment by national banks.

I have taken the trouble to search the record to dig up the facts, going back to the beginning, and I simply read and will incorporate in the RECORD a list of the men who have held high official positions in the Treasury Department, who have had direct supervision of national banks, and whose duty was to see the law enforced, who have graduated out of their offices into high positions with big salaries in the employment of national banks.

I take the highest first.

The first one who went to a bank or trust company was Charles S. Fairchild, president of a trust company in New York; then Lyman J. Gage, president United States Trust Company, New York; Leslie M. Shaw, resigned to become president of the Carnegie Trust Company.

Assistant secretaries: Hugh S. Thompson, comptroller of the New York Life Insurance Company; Frank A. Vanderlip, resigned to become first vice-president of the City Bank of New York, at which time Milton E. Ailes was private secretary to Secretary Gage. Milton E. Ailes resigned to become vice-president of the Riggs National Bank of this city.

But those are only sporadic instances. Here is the rich streak of ore, the pay dirt. I refer to the Comptrollers of the Currency, and every man here knows that the Comptroller of the Currency is the responsible official who has to deal with and supervise national banks and enforce the law. This is a list of those officers who have made their positions stepping-stones to employment, under the words of the resolution:

J. J. Knox, went out of Comptroller's Office in 1883 and became president of Bank of Republic, of New York.

H. W. Cannon, left Comptroller's Office in 1885 to become president of Chase National Bank, of New York.

W. L. Trenholm, left Comptroller's Office in 1888 to become president of American Surety Company, then North American Trust Company, of New York.

E. S. Lacey, left Comptroller's Office in 1891 to become president of Bankers' National Bank, of Chicago.

A. B. Hepburn, left Comptroller's Office in 1892 to become the president of the Chase National Bank, of New York.

J. H. Eckels, left Comptroller's Office in 1897 and became president Commercial National Bank, of Chicago.

C. G. Dawes, left Comptroller's Office in 1899 and became president of Central Trust Company, at Chicago, Ill.

Democrats and Republicans alike, all of them, apparently neglected their duty, their sworn duty, and ran the Treasury Department in the interest of the national banks, with the view, certainly with the result, that they are carefully taken care of for the balance of their lives; at least as long as they can make themselves useful to their employees. The United States Treasury has become an adjunct and an annex to Wall street. Its hundreds and hundreds of millions are poured over there when an emergency arises and deposited with the favorites of those in power, and as long as this Congress sits quiet and permits the laws to be trampled under foot by the national banks and permits the officers of the Government to prostitute their offices by encouraging gambling in violation of the law the President need not ask us for more legislation. He should turn his eye eastward from his office or send across the White House lawn to the Comptroller's office, read sections 5200 and 5208 and 5239 and the statute I read, enacted in 1882, and say, "Gentlemen, I am informed by a former official of the Government, at present a bank officer in New York, that if you will enforce these statutes you can stop stock gambling." Let him do that before he comes to the Senate with the information through the newspapers that some of his understrappers and flatterers—Neill, Garfield, and company—are going to write bills to be sent here for us to enact. Let him clean up before one door. Let the Executive make himself felt by enforcing one law before he asks for so many that are dangerous and radical.

Another one of these resolutions, Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Would the Senator mind naming some of the laws which the President recommends that the Senator regards as radical and dangerous and with which he disagrees?

Mr. TILLMAN. I disagree wholly with the doctrine that we should permit the railroads to pool.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator name another with which he does not agree, and which he regards as radical and dangerous?

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, for a man who is high-horsing all over the land, hurrahing about what he is going to do to predatory wealth, to have a conference with Morgan et al., ignoring the grave and reverend seigniors who were leaders of the Republican party when he was in his swaddling clothes, forgetting the men who made it what it is, kicking some of them out of office—let him carry out some of the laws on the statute books as a guaranty of good faith.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator has spoken of the President recommending so many laws which he regarded as radical and dangerous.

Mr. TILLMAN. I can not read all of this message.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; but in that message there is recommended an employers' liability bill. Does the Senator regard that as dangerous and radical?

Mr. TILLMAN. It would depend entirely on the phraseology of it. I think the Senator from Indiana might possibly frame one for which I would vote, although I would expect to find a rabbit's foot in it somewhere in favor of railroads, or trusts, or corporations. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If such crept in, I could depend upon the Senator from South Carolina finding it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will suspend. The Chair will advise the occupants of the galleries that under the rules of the Senate applause is not permitted.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the Senator agrees with the proposition that there should be an adequate employers' liability law. That is one of the chief recommendations of the President. Then, again, the President recommends a reasonable anti-injunction law. Does the Senator disagree with that?

Mr. TILLMAN. What is reasonable?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Such as the President recommends.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not know whether the President's recommendation is reasonable or unreasonable till I see it in print.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator regard any of the President's recommendations concerning labor legislation as radical and dangerous?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator——

Mr. TILLMAN. Wait a minute, if you please. I believe labor has the right to organize, and I favor the recognition of that right, and I would if necessary fight to have it enjoy that right, and at the same time, while I believe that the laborers who are organized have a right to demand the power to jointly use their influence and votes to get redress and protect themselves, I will never yield, except with my life, to the doctrine that one man shall say to another, "You shall not work."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I asked these questions—and I shall not pursue them further—because two or three times in his address the Senator had spoken about the many laws recommended by the President which were radical and dangerous and which, therefore, we were to infer, the Senator would disagree with. Yet, with the message before him, when he is asked to name the laws which are radical and dangerous, the Senator does not do it, but when two are mentioned that are thus recommended, the Senator agrees with the general principles.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just called attention in the preceding part of my speech to the fact that I thought the question of capitalization is one of the most vital in all the railroad-rate regulation. But the President was as dumb as an oyster when we might have done something with his help. Now he comes forward with a how-not-to-do-it programme, except to drum up votes?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think that a how-not-to-do-it programme would drum up votes?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Indiana can ask more questions possibly than I could answer in a year.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At this rate, I think so.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator point to anything in this message which is intended not to drum up votes?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In the sense that the recommendations of the message are for the welfare of the American people, the help of American business, and the relief of American labor, of course they appeal to the people, and therefore get votes.

Mr. TILLMAN. And why has not the Republican Congress put these laws on the statute books heretofore?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator agree not to obstruct any attempt to put those laws on the statute books?

Mr. TILLMAN. It depends on which one you pick out. I am not going to give to a wild and radical man like the Senator from Indiana, who gets up here and gravely contends for the doctrine that Congress can regulate child labor in the States, the right to say what I shall vote for. I am a cornfield lawyer, but I have more sense than that. [Laughter.]

I was proceeding, Mr. President, to call attention to the fifth resolution, which we have under consideration:

Fifth. Whether national banks are using trust companies or other financial associations as agencies through which to transact business forbidden by the law governing national banks, and what legislation is necessary to prevent such an evasion of the statutes.

I hold in my hand a clipping from the New York Sun of February 25. I will read the headlines. "First National's new plan. To organize the First Security Company. Capital $10,000,000." I will ask to have it read from the desk, and let my friend, the Senator from Indiana, see what is going on. He is so busy looking out for vote getting just now that he is not paying any attention to the deviltry which is going on in New York under the laws we already have.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The First National Bank has formulated a plan for the organization of a security company to be known as the First Security Company, with a capital of $10,000,000. On receipt of the assent of its stockholders to the plan, the bank proposes to declare a special dividend of 100 per cent, amounting in the aggregate to $10,000,000, the dividend to be turned over to trustees and to supply the capital of the security company. The trustees will hold for the stockholders of the bank all the stock of the security company. The trustees are to be George F. Baker, president of the bank; the vice-presidents, and the cashier. A circular to stockholders explains the plan as follows:

"It is deemed to be for the interests of stockholders of this bank that a security company, such as has proved advantageous in the case of several other banks, should be organized for the purpose, in part, of transacting for its patrons certain lines of profitable business which, though often transacted by bankers, are not expressly included within the corporate powers of national banks. Among these are the acquiring and holding of real estate, securities, stocks, and other property.

"To this end it is desired to secure the assent in writing of our stockholders to a plan of organizing a security company under the name of the First Security Company, with a paid up capital of $10,000,000, the stock to be issued to and held by six trustees, who shall be the president, vice-presidents, and the cashier of the bank. These trustees shall exercise the powers of ownership of the stock, shall elect the same board of directors as that of the bank, shall collect all dividends, and pay the same over to the bank for immediate distribution to its shareholders who have assented to this plan.

"Upon receiving the assent of the stockholders, the bank purposes to make a special dividend of 100 per cent ($10,000,000), to be received by the trustees and to be applied to the payment of the capital stock of the security company, which stock shall be held by the trustees for the benefit of the shareholders of the bank assenting to this plan."

The First National in its December report to the Comptroller of the Currency showed $19,553,900 undivided profits. The capital of the bank is $10,000,000. Practically, accordingly, the plan consists in a segregation of half of the undivided profits in a company with greater powers than are conferred on the national banks. A similar plan was carried out by the First National Bank of Chicago in the organization of the First Trust and Savings Bank.

The circular also says that the First Security Company will be organized in pursuance of an agreement between George F. Baker and other trustees and J. Pierpont Morgan and other stockholders. In this agreement it is provided that the directors of the security company shall be the same as the directors of the bank and that the dividends and other earnings of the security company shall be paid over to the bank for distribution among the stockholders of the bank. The stock in the security company is to change ownership only with a transfer of bank stock, so that at all times the interests of stockholders in the bank and stockholders in the security company will be identical. (The New York Sun.)

Mr. TILLMAN. It will be seen that one of these gigantic national banks in New York cold-bloodedly announces through the newspapers that it is organizing the trust company, the officers of the trust company to be the same as those of the bank, in order to have the trust company do things that the bank can not do, although it is the bank's own money. What are you going to do about that, you, Senator from Indiana, who is so anxious to know what is the matter here?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What does the Senator from South Carolina propose to do about it?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have asked time and again that the Committee on Finance shall investigate these matters, and I can rely upon the great experience and wisdom of the members of that committee to propose some regulation which will prevent it, if they want to prevent it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the Senator——

Mr. TILLMAN. But the enforcement of the law as it is now would prevent it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the Senator complaining, himself proposes no regulation. He refers it to a committee in control of those on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from South Carolina has introduced too many resolutions and bills which have died stillborn in the pigeonholes of the Republican chairman of the committee, for him to undertake to worry his brains about providing brains for you. [Laughter.] But the enforcement of the law, as we now have it, will stop this deviltry.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that an amendment to the finance bill submitted for the express purpose of preventing national banks from using their deposits for gambling purposes would effectually meet the case.

Mr. TILLMAN. We will vote on all those amendments some time in the near future, and I will be prepared to back up my friend, the Senator from Oklahoma, in any constructive legislation which will stop those devils from stealing all the money that the South has and nearly all that the West can get.

I want to return to that stock-gambling feature, however, because I have some facts and some observations which I had prepared, but in the confusion of my manuscript and data here I did not use them a while ago.

My attention was called in connection with this recent panic to preceding panics and money stringencies, and, comparing the panic of 1907 with others, I find that in 1907, in October, only one small bank in Chicago failed, because there was no stock gambling going on there, while fifteen banking institutions in New York City, with an aggregate of over two hundred million dollars of deposits, either closed their doors or sustained very serious runs as the result of the loss of confidence in their management.

I have here a table of those banks from official reports, which I shall ask to insert at the proper place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

Statement showing deposits of national banks, State banks, and trust companies in Greater New York which either failed or sustained serious runs about October 1, 1907.

National banks.	Net deposits Oct. 5, 1907.	Remarks.	Total.
National Bank of North America	$13,539,000	Failed	$34,172,600
New Amsterdam National Bank	5,086,000	do
First National Bank (Brooklyn)	3,451,000	do
Mercantile National Bank	12,096,600	Serious run

State banks.	Net deposits Sept. 29, 1907.	Remarks.	Total.
Mechanics and Traders'	$18,779,000	Failed	$45,934,800
Oriental	10,685,000	do
Hamilton	7,117,800	do
Twelfth Ward	2,853,000	do
Borough	4,143,000	do
Brooklyn	2,357,000	do

Trust companies.	Net deposits June 27, 1907.	Remarks.	Total.
Knickerbocker	$64,920,000	Failed	$172,681,000
Jenkins	3,422,000	do
Williamsburg	8,325,000	do
Lincoln	24,778,000	Serious run
Trust Company of America	71,236,000	do

Total deposits, $252,788,400.

Aggregate deposits, banks and trust companies, New York City, $2,000,000,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. Again these failures and runs caused the New York banks to issue clearing-house certificates and to suspend currency payments, and this action within twenty-four hours caused the clearing-house banks all over the country to follow the same course to prevent the withdrawal of the cash for shipment to New York, where currency commanded a heavy premium.

A friend has sent me an exhibit of clearing-house certificates of various shapes and characters and sizes and denominations. Of course I could not ask the Government Printing Office to incorporate them in my speech, but the curious on the other side who want to get acquainted with clearing-hosue certificates and the subterfuges to which the national banking system lends itself can examine these.

Mr. OVERMAN. Turn it around so that we can see.

Mr. TILLMAN. You are not interested. At least you are interested, but you are like bumps on a log sitting here and taking wisdom from Indiana and elsewhere. There is sheet after sheet, clearing-house certificate after clearing-house certificate, some of them with pigs behind them and every imaginable scheme of shinplaster money. These were dumped on the people of the country in place of good honest greenbacks, and then you call that fiat money. What is this? Pass it along among the brethren on your side [handing exhibit to Mr. BEVERIDGE]. The Senator from Indiana and his colleagues absolutely refuse to recognize their own offspring. [Laughter.]

The Senator from Rhode Island informed us the other day, with that snap of the lip which we all have learned to recognize as meaning business, that this would "never be tolerated again." Does the Senator mean there will be a President some time or other who will enforce the 10 per cent tax against State banks of issue or illegal issues or anything of that sort? I should like to have an answer.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I assume that the officers of the law will do their duty. I think they will. That is the reason why I undertook to make that suggestion. In this particular case there was a suspension not only of payments, but a suspension of law, a suspension of law, perhaps, that was justified by the crisis in which the country found itself.

Mr. TILLMAN. The suspension of law by the banks, followed by the suspension of law by the Secretary of the Treasury in issuing the bonds contrary to law. I will ask the Senator, if he will permit me, whether he is willing to commit himself to the assertion that the issue of Panama bonds and the 3 per cent certificates are both legal?

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Committee on Finance, recognizing the things that have been done in the past which were only justified by the occasion, have presented to the Senate and to the country a measure which they believe will stop such transactions in the future.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am glad the Senator from Rhode Island has hopes. "Hope springs eternal in the human breast." While we have no assurance other than the word of the Senator from Rhode Island that this will never be tolerated again, I believe if the Senator will consent to the incorporation in his bill of some amendments which would seek to keep the reserves of the country banks in their own vaults, not send them to New York to be used by the national banks there as a basis for stock gambling, he will contribute very largely to a cessation of these evils and to providing a remedy which will be actual.

Here is what Comptroller Ridgely says with regard to this on page 70 of his 1907 report:

> On October 26 the New York clearing-house banks decided to issue clearing-house certificates for use in the payment of balances and to limit, if not suspend, the shipment of currency to out-of-town banks. In this the New York banks were followed by those of the other central reserve cities and most of the reserve cities. The result was at once to precipitate a most serious bank crisis and a famine of currency for pay rolls and other necessary cash transactions.

The Comptroller's report shows that on August 22, 1907, just preceding the New York panic, the national banks in that city held deposits made by other banking institutions to the great amount of $465,000,000, of which $259,000,000 belonged to out-of-town national banks.

At the same time New York banks had loaned out on stocks and bonds about $400,000,000, an amount nearly equal to what they owed to banks which were unable to draw out this money when they needed it to move the crops, because it was invested on the stock exchange.

The country banks had sent their money to New York; New York had loaned it to the brokers on these illegal certification schemes, and when the country banks said "We want our money," New York lifted its voice and said to the country people, "Issue your certificates or any other old thing; the emergency is here; and unless you will come to our help down we will go."

The Senator from Rhode Island said the emergency was so great that it was permissible to evade the law, to break the law, fail to enforce it, or whatever you call it.

History repeated itself, according to Comptroller Ridgely, who, in speaking of other panics on page 64 of his 1907 report, quotes from the Comptroller's report of 1884 in connection with the panic of that year as follows:

> There is little doubt that one of the causes which led to the local disturbances among the banks, national and State and private bankers of the city of New York, was their intimate relation in many instances with the New York Stock Exchange, and the fact that a large portion of the loans made by the banks and bankers of New York were based on the security of stocks and bonds, often speculative in their character, which are dealt in and regularly called at the stock board.

This unholy alliance between the banks and the New York Stock Exchange is as strong or stronger than it was in 1884, for, besides lending the reserve funds of out-of-town banks intrusted to their keeping on stocks and bonds, these national banks lend their credit besides to stock brokers often in violation of law.

Nearly one-half of the exchanges for the clearing-house banks in New York City consists of checks certified by stockbrokers, and their published reports on August 22, 1907, show that ten national banks in New York with individual deposits amounting to $225,000,000 certified checks on that day to the amount of $121,000,000.

TABLE 1.

List of ten national banks in New York City which certify checks for stockbrokers, showing the "individual deposits" and "certified checks" of these banks on June 18, 1906, and May 22, 1907, dates of their reports to the Comptroller.

Name of bank.	June 18, 1906.		May 22, 1907.

The certifications on May 22, 1907, were greatly less, because the stock market was much less active than on June 18, 1906.

Some of these banks go through the form of "accepting" these checks instead of certifying them, imagining this pretense enables them to evade the law.

Most of them also adopt the subterfuge of discounting the unsecured demand notes of brokers on which no interest is paid and placing the proceeds of these notes to the credit of these brokers, certifying their checks against the credits, although the law plainly says that the certification of checks is unlawful unless the party drawing the checks has on deposit "an amount of money equal to the amounts specified in such check."

And the proceeds of these brokers' unsecured notes, bearing no interest, are imagined to be "money" on deposit.

The national banks in this way in reality lend their credit to the brokers, which the courts have declared the banks have no power to do.

One way to stop this investment of reserve funds of out-of-town banks in stock-exchange securities is to change the law as to reserve against deposits so as to compel the out-of-town banks to keep all their reserve in cash in their own vaults, where they can get it when needed, instead of sending it to New York and other centers to feed and stimulate stock speculation.

This would work very little hardship on the banks in the South and West, for they receive, as a rule, only 2 per cent interest a year on the portion of their reserve they now deposit in reserve cities.

Another check on speculation will be to compel the national banks which violate section 5200 as to excessive loans in certifying checks to obey the law in this respect, and to amend the law so as to compel them to certify checks for brokers only against good and sufficient collateral security.

As the practice now stands, a bank which can not lawfully lend more than $100,000 on the best collateral security will frequently lend $200,000 or $300,000 or more to a broker on his note without any collateral whatsoever and without any criticism from the Comptroller's office.

This lavish use of bank resources and credit for years has borne fruit by enabling Napoleons of finance through the medium of the New York Stock Exchange to market billions of dollars of almost worthless stocks and to place these in the hands of helpless investors who have exchanged hard-earned money for them, which has thus been diverted from the channels of legitimate business.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator address himself to the question of remedy? I admit—and the whole proposition that is before the Senate from the Committee on Finance is based upon the assumption—that the condition in New York, the action of the Government, everything that took place, is a thing to be regretted that it occurred. The action of the Government, the issuing of the Panama bonds, the deposits in the banks, were all unfortunate; possibly not legal, it may be not justifiable, but quite likely under the circumstances excusable.

The whole proposition of the Committee on Finance in the bill before the Senate, upon which the Senator is now addressing himself, is based upon the concession that all of these things, the resort to the clearing houses, the extra powers of the Government, were most unfortunate, and if to be made a precedent in the future, deplorable. The bill that is before the Senate is upon the basis of an attempt to prevent any such conditions hereafter. I do not know, nobody can tell, whether the bill is right, whether it will meet every emergency in the future, but the harangue of the Senator, the able speech of the Senator——

Mr. TILLMAN. Take the "harangue" back or take the last back, one or the other.

Mr. HALE. I used a word, Mr. President, which was not only in my mind, but I venture to say was in the mind of a great many other Senators. But I withdraw it.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is not objectionable to me at all. I do not mind it, but I just wanted you to stick to one form or the other, and not put up a mixture like that, for you split me in half. [Laughter.] Harangues can not be able speeches.

Mr. HALE. All of the portraiture and picturing of the condition in New York that the Senator and some other Senators have indulged in are in a degree justifiable, because they are unfortunate and to be lamented. Nobody realizes that so much as the Committee on Finance. Nobody recognized that situation more than the members of that committee in framing the bill.

While I do not of course expect that I can limit the Senator, and I do not want to, I wish he would address himself to some proposition that would be better to meet these very difficulties that the Senator encounters, and I encounter, that everybody encounters, and that the Committee on Finance encountered. The trial that the committee is making is to relieve not only the situation in the past, but to prevent it, so far as it can, in the future. Before the Senator closes I wish he would tell the Senate what he thinks would be a better bill than the one presented by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, it would be very easy to do that. I will simply say the bill of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is a better bill than yours.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has plenty of time to do that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I say it is very easy to tell you what bill I think is better than yours. It is the bill introduced by the Senator from Texas; and there are various amendments pending introduced by one and another here on both sides which would improve the Aldrich bill vastly. I had the honor to introduce one to prevent the retirement of all the bank currency of the country at the will of speculators in New York in a night if they saw fit. You could get together and work on a scheme of limiting their retirement to $9,000,000 in one month. The Senator from Rhode Island has agreed to some modification or acceptance of that principle, with some modification, I suppose, which will bear on the emergency currency, if it shall be issued.

The Senator did not ask me to give my reasons for objecting to the Aldrich bill, but to suggest a better one. I have already pointed out in general phrase that I think the bill of the Senator from Texas is better. We can very often decide what ought not to be done, although we may not be so ready to suggest what ought to be done.

I have been trying to point out that the gambling in stocks and bonds by overriding the law by the national banks with the knowledge and consent of the Comptroller of the Currency and the President, too, should be stopped. That is a thing that would help the cause wonderfully.

As far as the issue of notes during an emergency is concerned, I have not given the subject very much consideration, because I have no responsibility in it except to criticise the work of gentleman on the other side. I have not devoted very much study to it, but I have an idea in my head that a scheme of interchangeable bonds, the Government issuing a bond which should bear on its face the proposition that whenever the holder of that bond sees fit to deposit it in the Treasury he shall be allowed to draw its face value in greenbacks, would be far better than this. Interchangeable bonds, I say, would be better than the Aldrich bill. Instead of having the banks use the bonds which they have bought, railroad bonds included, municipal and State bonds included, as a basis for deposit in the Treasury and drawing out the money of the United States from the Treasury guaranteed by this Government, why do you not let all the money bear the imprint of the Government? If the promise to pay, a bond, bearing 2 or 3 per cent interest is so good that it commands a high premium, why should not the promise to pay in gold on demand not be good for money? When you can answer satisfactorily why the one promise is good and the other not, it will be worth while to consider some other suggestions. But I throw it out as a suggestion that the most promising scheme to me to enable us to get more money when we need it is to have an interchangeable bond, so that whenever any man who wants more greenbacks, and they are at a premium by reason of speculation or otherwise, he can go to the Treasury and deposit bonds and draw greenbacks on them.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think it desirable to increase the public debt of the United States for that purpose?

Mr. TILLMAN. No, indeed.

Mr. ALDRICH. How does the Senator propose to issue bonds, and for what?

Mr. TILLMAN. If we have not got money enough, let us issue the greenback, and let the people get them in the order of business and then use them in banking. I do not see why we should be compelled to pay interest for the benefit of the bankers by issuing interest-bearing securities and then turn around and when the people have this one promise of the Government say you can not give them another promise of the Government. Call me greenbacker or fiat-money advocate, or whatever you see fit; the promise of the Government with the green on the back of it or the yellow or any other color you see fit on the front of it, with a promise to pay, is good enough for me. I do not care whether you like it or not.

Speaking about stock gambling and the profits of it and the men who have made great fortunes at it, we have had a remarkable exhibition here. It is a very remarkable thing in one sense. Before I go to that, the bankers, who are supposed to be in constant telephonic communication with the Senator from Rhode Island and in a way to dictate and boss his actions, object to his bill. I presented a letter from Mr. Forgan the other day, the high muck-a-muck of the Chicago clearing house, in which he objects, and there are other banking associations and high financiers who object to it. Why? They want asset currency. They are not satisfied with the half loaf which the Aldrich bill gives them, but they want the whole cake.

I, for one, believe that the holder of any type of bond which the Senator from Rhode Island says shall be security for emergency currency, whether he is a banker or a private citizen, should have the same right to go to the Treasury and deposit that bond and get those notes that any national bank has. What good excuse can you give to limiting this privilege to a few national banks? Nothing except the desire to further the interests of special classes who are the pets of the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina will kindly suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have just a little more to say, and then I am through.

I was just alluding to the attitude of one of the most famous financiers in this country, a man of wonderful genius in raking together millions and who during this panic is said to have "saved the country." His praises have been sung by magazine writers and others, and we have been told that but for his magnificent generalship and management the catastrophe would have been a thousandfold worse. I allude to Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan.

Mr. President, it is a notorious fact that Mr. Morgan has been a greater beneficiary of this system of gambling and stock watering than any other man in the world, perhaps, and when men come forward and press him to the front as being such a benefactor to the human family, and especially to the American people in the recent crisis, I simply get disgusted; that is all. I can not help myself, because I know he has been the beneficiary of these schemes over there and of this system and he is the head of institutions which have profited by it. He himself participated, through his brokers, in this rounding up of the lambs and shearing them. I will give you a few instances of some of his work.

The profits of this nefarious stock mongering have found their way into the pockets of the very men who, when the evil results of their fraud manifested itself, posed as "saviors" and "uncrowned kings," and are lauded to the skies when they were really trying to save themselves from the disasters which threatened to overwhelm them along with their deluded victims. One of these "saviors" had done more than any other of the money kings to deluge the stock market with watered stock. As far back as 1894 he had floated $120,000,000 of railroad stock, which, while freely bought and sold on the New York Stock Exchange, has never paid a dividend. In 1895 he floated $113,000,000 more railroad stock, which has never paid a dividend, and in 1902, in an effort to monopolize the ocean steamship trade, floated $100,000,000 more of the same kind of stock. These are only a few of the achievements of this "uncrowned king." With others of his kind he has created a Frankenstein monster, which, unsatiated by the blood of suicides and tears of heartbroken women, threatened to devour and consume his creators, who were able to quench his thirst only by torrents of gold poured out by the Federal Treasury. Morgan himself was in the deep water swimming when Cortelyou went to the rescue.

Now, Mr. President, in conclusion I want to ask the Senator from Rhode Island to remember that a year or more ago I tried to get him to investigate the Chicago situation, and pointed out the absolute disregard of law in the dealings of the Walsh bank and of Walsh himself. Mr. Walsh has since been tried and convicted, which indicates that he had broken the law. But he had absolution in one sense, because other thousands of them had broken the law, and Comptroller after Comptroller of the Currency had called attention to these shortcomings of the various national banks and bankers, and Walsh was made the scapegoat, so to speak, of the system, which is pernicious and dangerous and devilish, and ought to be stopped.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator from South Carolina will remember that the reasons given for not entering upon a Congressional investigation were that the question and all the transactions were pending before the grand jury in Chicago. Since that time Mr. Walsh has been indicted and convicted. It certainly is no part of the business of the Senate to take up a criminal case which is pending before a court and undertake to adjudicate it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator will also recollect that the action of the clearing house in taking over the Walsh assets and settling with his depositors, involving a direct violation of the law, was the subject I asked to be investigated, not Walsh's own transgressions. It was with a view to having such remedial legislation, if it is required, or having attention directed to the fact that the laws as they are are not enforced, that I sought to have the Senate Committee on Finance act then.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was apparent to every intelligent man, I think, who investigated or considered the question of the Chicago clearing house that that transaction, instead of being discreditable, was very creditable to the banks in Chicago, and that it saved a financial crisis, not only in that city but in the country. I believe it was not only justified by but entirely within the provisions of the law.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator's opinions are so pronounced and he is——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator allow me just a word?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HOPKINS. With reference to the action of the clearing house in Chicago and the aid that they rendered to the City National Bank, there is no person who is familiar with the facts and has a knowledge of the law who has ever contended that those banks violated the law. The subsequent events have shown that they did not lose a dollar. The money they advanced they took absolute security for and received the regular rates of interest. As I have stated, it has never been contended by those familiar with the facts that any bank in Chicago in coming to the rescue of Mr. Walsh's bank did, as stated by the Senator from Rhode Island, other than a patriotic and a just act.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has said all that once or twice before, and it was not worth while for him to come in now. I am not trying to hit a man who is down. Walsh is simply, as I said, a victim of a system which has grown up under the lax administration of the Treasury Department. He did what hundreds of other national bankers are doing every day in the year. I am only directing the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island, as the Senator who is the responsible head of the financial legislation of this body, to these facts and calling his attention to the iniquity and evils of stock gambling and lending money to one's self as a director, and other things, in violation of section 5208, and asking him to investigate and report what legislation, if any, is necessary to stop these things. If he finds that no legislation is necessary and the Senate shall adopt a resolution coming from his committee calling attention to the sections already on the statute books which provide a remedy if the President would see that they are enforced, I will have accomplished my purpose; and that was all I had in view in undertaking to bring up the facts in regard to the Comptroller's office.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Rhode Island, in conclusion, if he will not agree to let this resolution be passed by the Senate and go to his committee rather than have it referred to the committee, for I know when things are referred there it means that they are going to be laid out and buried.

Mr. ALDRICH. Speaking for myself, I shall not resist the passage of the resolution submitted by the Senator from South Carolina; and the committee, I have no doubt, if they are so instructed, will investigate to the best of their ability the subjects to which the Senator has alluded.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thank the Senator from Rhode Island; I thank the Senate; and apologize for my "harangue," or whatever you call it. If I shall have succeeded in directing attention to a very serious and grave condition in our financial matters, which is not considered in the Aldrich bill and to which we should direct ourselves in order to get a remedy, I will be content, and I hope that the next time somebody else gives us an "harangue" he will give as much good sense along with it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask, if the Senator from Indiana will permit me——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Although the morning hour has expired and the resolution has gone to the Calendar, I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the resolution submitted by him may be considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator wants to address himself to the resolution, all right.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I merely want to make some observations on the unfinished business.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, let the resolution pass before it gets lost in the shuffle.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am heartily in favor of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 3023) to amend the national banking laws.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I am very glad indeed that the resolution has passed, and I am in hearty sympathy with it and every other resolution that has for its purpose the finding out of any facts upon any subject with which this body must deal.

I have been, as indeed the entire Senate has been, rarely entertained, as we always are, by the Senator from South Carolina, whose picturesque phrases and Carlylean diction make him one of the most attractive debaters in either House of Congress.

However, it was not alone to pay him this heartfelt tribute that I rose, but to note, Mr. President, a curious change in the Senator's state of mind. There is, perhaps, no study so engaging as the transformation of the opinions of public men forced by the exigencies of politics. Gladstone, it is said, went into public life as a High-churchman and ended as the advocate of church disestablishment.

He began his public career as an ultraconservative and ended as an ultraradical. He began as the defender of vested interests and closed his career in his last great speech in the Midlothian campaign by declaring that in forty years of public life he had always found vested interests wrong, although he started out in their behalf.

All these things we may expect as men progress in their public duties. But hardly anybody could have prophesied the change that has occurred in the Senator from South Carolina. Above all men in either party he has been considered the especial and particular tribune of the people. He came here in that capacity, and he has maintained his title. If anything was dear to him, it was "the masses."

And yet we find this apostle of the populace referring in his brilliant address to "the ignorant masses"—"the ignorant masses," those were his very words. He spoke of the people as "poor, simple souls"—"poor, simple souls," those were his words. Great heavens!——

Mr. TILLMAN. Republican people.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What will be the consequence when that speech appears in South Carolina? [Laughter.]

Of course, Mr. President, I do not intimate that the heart of the Senator does not beat as true to "the ignorant masses," as he calls them now, as it ever beat; or that he is to-day less faithful to the soil than when he came here directly from it. Nor do I charge him, or any other Senator on either side, and especially upon that side, as a Presidential election approaches, with the motive of "playing politics." Oh, no; far be it from the minority to make an appeal to votes; far be it from the minority to "play politics" that may capture votes, although they need them badly now, and will need them worse in November.

But, Mr. President, assuming that this is upon the broader grounds, perhaps, of higher politics, the change is explained in the Senator's own language. It has become the fashion upon that side of the Chamber, as well as by a certain class, among whom are the stock gamblers of whom the Senator speaks, to denounce the President. The President, says the Senator from South Carolina, appeals to "the ignorant masses." The President, he asserts, talks to these "poor, simple souls;" and he resents either the President appealing to the people, whose Chief Magistrate he is, on the one hand, or his sending messages to Congress, which the Constitution commands him to send to the people's representatives, upon the other hand. What the Senator apparently would have the President of the United States do, if a Republican President, is to do nothing at all.

No doubt that would play in with the programme which the minority would like the President and the Republican party to map out.

The Senator from South Carolina compared the speeches of the President—with not one of which in their substance and ideas the Senator himself will disagree—to the speeches of Andrew Johnson. Why, Mr. President, every schoolboy, much more every informed man, knows that there is no comparison, but only contrast. One presented the grievances that he imagined he himself had sustained; the other denounces grievances which the people have really sustained; one were personal defenses of a discredited politician; the other are the appeals of a great publicist; one were the transient and evanescent utterances of a man who got nothing done, and the other are the great addresses of a statesman who has got more things done in his Administration than has any President since the civil war.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Indiana listened to me with very little profit if he supposes for a moment that in my comparison of the speeches of those two Presidents I had any other motive than to draw attention to the subserviency of the Republican Senate now and the aggressive and tyrannical action of the Republican Senate then; to the cowardice of the present Senate and to the tyranny of the old Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And that is precisely the point to which I was coming.

Mr. President, why was it that Andrew Johnson had no influence with Congress and that Theodore Roosevelt has infinite influence with Congress? It is because one of them had not the confidence of the people, and the other one has the entire confidence of the people. It is one of the most beautiful, as well as one of the most beneficent workings of our popular form of government, that any branch of it that at any particular period best represents the people has the confidence of the people.

Why was it that in the last Democratic Administration its President lost the control of Congress almost as completely as did Andrew Johnson, and that the Senator's own party, together with his colleagues upon this side, had the confidence of the people? It was because they more accurately represented the people's thoughts, needs, demands, and aspirations. There is no subserviency upon this side of the Chamber to any power on earth, except to the public opinion of the American people. What the Senator thinks is subserviency to the demands of the President is only our Republican harmony with those demands which are nothing more than the demands of the American people.

Mr. President, strange to say, the Senator indulges—as politicians in search of an issue, no matter how able they are, must unfailingly indulge—in a paradox, one side of which destroys the other. The Senator described the President's power as coming from his appeals to "the ignorant masses," and in the same breath said that that power comes from his use of patronage. Was it the use of patronage, Mr. President, that impressed

Congress with the necessity of a single law that the President has recommended in the last seven historic years, the passage of which his recommendation helped to secure?

Was it the use of patronage that got through the law establishing the Department of Commerce and Labor, perhaps the greatest and most important piece of legislation that has been passed by an American Congress since the Constitution was adopted, with perhaps the single exception of the Platt amendment? The Senator denounces us for voting for the very laws which the Senator and his colleagues, seeking every excuse they could find for not voting for, yet were compelled to vote for?

Take all of these great laws, which are a part of this mighty structure of righteousness which the wisdom of the American people as voiced by the President has enacted into statutes by this Congress on both sides—does the Senator disagree with one of them? Would he repeal a single line of any of them? Does the Senator, speaking for his side, propose to go before the American people with the proposition to abolish the Department of Commerce and Labor? No. To repeal the railway-rate law? No. To repeal the pure-food law? No. To repeal the meat-inspection law? No. To repeal the irrigation law? No. To repeal or mangle a single one of those great laws which constitute the Republican legislative record, every one of which was passed upon the recommendation of the President made in his messages?

Mr. President, the Senator not only denounces the President of the American people for frankly speaking to the American people—although what harm there could be in that has not been suggested now and was never suggested before—but, following the lead of the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], the President is denounced for sending messages to Congress. The President, it appears, must be denounced for something or other. The Senator from Georgia denounces him for holding conferences with experts in order that he may intelligently recommend legislation to us; the Senator from South Carolina denounces him for making appeals to "the ignorant masses" on the one hand, and sending messages to us on the other hand; the gamblers of Wall street to a man also denounce the President for that very law enforcement of which the Senator from South Carolina says the President has been neglectful of; and every man who has been guilty of unrighteousness throughout this whole country in one common chorus denounces the President for having caused the recent panic. So the Senator will see the company in which his words have placed him.

Why, Mr. President, I was not present in the Chamber the other day when the Senator from Georgia made his denunciation of the President for consulting with men who could inform him, who had studied the question, before he sent a message to Congress; but I heard the same thing voiced to-day with that peculiar vividness which characterizes the language of the Senator from South Carolina, and I wondered to what a desperate pass the Democratic party had come in the search of a campaign cry when they would abuse the President for informing himself before he makes recommendations and then denounce him for making recommendations after he has informed himself?

We hear, Mr. President, and justly hear, of the great constitutional learning of the Senator from Georgia, and the Senator from South Carolina has said that he is a corn-field lawyer; but nevertheless he understands the Constitution, and in my opinion the common people understand it better than some "constitutional lawyers;" but whether a "constitutional lawyer" or a "corn-field lawyer," no person can fail to understand this provision of the Constitution:

SEC. 3. He [the President] shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

So we see that, in sending his messages to Congress as to what he deems necessary and expedient, the President has done only the duty which he gave his sacred oath to do when he became President of the Republic; and in consulting the men whose business it is to study the question about which he is sending his message to Congress, he is following that practical common sense about which the Senator from South Carolina talks so much. It would appear that the Senator is not a monopolist of that.

Why, if the President is going to inform us concerning the state of the Union, if he is going to recommend to our attention measures which he believes we should pass, it is not only the President's privilege but it is his bounden duty to consult every man whom he thinks can give him light upon the subject.

Does the Senator from Georgia or the Senator from South Carolina criticise the President for seeking information and wisdom from every source upon a grave matter of legislation which he is going to ask Congress to enact? Surely not, Mr. President, on second thought; not even in the passion of partisan bewilderment caused by the fact that Congress, under the lead of the President, is doing things which meet the approval of the American people, and therefore which those Senators know are going to capture the votes of the American people at the next election.

Mr. President, I referred a moment ago to the measures we have passed. They are so great, they are so permanent, they are so harmonious that they constitute a historic body of laws to which the man who writes the remainder of Von Holst's Constitutional History will give an entire volume. So great was their importance and so wise were they, Mr. President, that although every one of them was a Republican measure recommended by a Republican President, the other side was forced to give to every one of those measures their votes.

Mr. TILLMAN. He stole them from our platform. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina ratified the theft [laughter] instead of objecting to it. Of course, the Senator says now they were stolen from his platform. He must say something and what else is left for him to say? The Senator's charge of "theft" is an echo of the Senator's "peerless leader," to whom I shall come in a single moment. The Senator himself could not get those laws passed when the last Democratic Administration was in power.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have not had any.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Was not Mr. Cleveland President?

Mr. TILLMAN. He was not a Democrat.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What was he—a mugwump President?

Mr. TILLMAN. He was some kind of a thing; I do not know what. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Ah, Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will not approve of a Republican President and denounces the only Democratic President his party has had since Buchanan, he is in a political predicament which calls for our sympathy, which he has. [Laughter.]

Again, not only does the Senator, or any other man upon the other side in either House of Congress, not disagree with or propose to repeal a single line of those great epoch-making laws that we have passed on the recommendation of Theodore Roosevelt, but he can not tell us of a single recommendation which the President now makes with which he disagrees. So, Mr. President, we see the attitude of the Senator, for which we all have pity.

He is in the painful position of belonging to a party that is about to go into a campaign and face the American people at an election where the Senator and his party have not one single proposition of the Republican party which they denounce to-day or against which they voted in the past. In that situation, Mr. President, we can not blame the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] or the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] or any Senator in search of an issue for opposing the President upon any pretext whatever.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina tells us—and I think the American people will be rather interested to hear it—that Theodore Roosevelt is not only to be blamed for appealing to "the ignorant masses;" not only to be blamed for doing his constitutional duty and sending messages recommending laws to the Congress; not only to be blamed for consulting the most experienced and best-read and most competent advisers before he sends those messages, but he is actually to be blamed for the nonenforcement of the laws. The Administration of Theodore Roosevelt an Administration of nonenforcement of laws! Let the Senator ask the Wall street gamblers, of whom he talks so much, what they think about Theodore Roosevelt as to his nonenforcement of the laws.

Let him ask the Standard Oil officials what they think about Theodore Roosevelt as a nonenforcer of the laws. Let him ask the furious heads of the ruthless corporations that came to the point where they regarded themselves as above the laws of the Nation what they think about Theodore Roosevelt as a nonenforcer of the laws of the Republic. They will tell him that in all their lives they never had the statutes so rigidly enforced as they have been since Theodore Roosevelt became President; and it is a literal fact upon record that since he became President more suits have been brought under the Elkins law, more cases have been brought under the Sherman antitrust law, more actions have been commenced by the Department of Justice to dissolve trusts and overturn all villainous business than in any three former Administrations put together. That does not reflect upon former Administrations, because then the country was busy with different things. But the period arrived—and with it the man—which began the moral regeneration of American business and the writing into law of those statutes of common honesty on the one hand and their enforcement upon the other hand.

The Senator cited certain lands that the President might get for the American people; but he did not tell us how those lands should be gotten. Does the Senator expect us to spoliate property? What has been the actual fact concerning public lands? Since Theodore Roosevelt became President we have recovered for the American people, we have gathered into great reserves more of the public possessions, and, having done that, we have more completely secured them to the uses of the public than ever before in our history. If the Senator does not believe that, let him ask the land thieves of the Northwest. If he does not believe that, let him ask the timber robbers of the West. If he does not believe that, let him ask all those who are now compelled to pay for the use of the public domain, who before used it for nothing.

The fact is that the President has been criticised for his extreme severity in that matter by able and honest men who thought that in that particular he was going too far; and yet we are told by the Senator from South Carolina that one of the things for which the President can be criticised and denounced on the floor of the American Senate is not only that he has not enforced the laws against wrongdoers, but that he has left the public domain, of which he has recovered more than any other President, in the hands of the spoilers.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Indiana permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly, I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course the Senator from Indiana chooses to garble and distort what I said, to ignore some points and put interpretations on others that are entirely foreign to their meaning; but in this matter of the public domain, I call his attention to the fact that the laying out of forest reserves and setting aside millions and millions of acres of land in those reserves is about the sum and substance of the President's exploits in regard to the public domain. There have been a few——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What about the prosecution of the land thieves of the Northwest?

Mr. TILLMAN. How many of them have been prosecuted?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Every one of them against whom the Government could find evidence to prosecute. The difference between the Senator and the President is that the President will prosecute anybody when he has the evidence to do so and the Senator would prosecute everybody, regardless of the evidence.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator would search for some evidence, which is on the statute books plain and clear, to the effect that these lands were granted to these railroads upon condition that they should be sold to actual settlers in area not exceeding 160 acres at $2.50 an acre. The President has known that, and never has made a move, never has written a message, never has recommended this servile Senate and House to do a thing to restore those lands to the public domain, notwithstanding the fact that for years and years during his entire term they have been withheld from sale by these railroad corporations, and people out there can not get any homes because the monopolists seized them from the Congressional grant.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, in the cataract of resolutions which the Senator has poured upon this Senate, why has he not included one upon that subject?

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has included one, and the Senate adopted it and brought the only information in here in regard to the public domain held by the railroads that has ever come here since I have been on this floor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then, why has the Senator not introduced another resolution demanding of the Department of Justice that it shall proceed? It seems to me, Mr. President, that the Senator's rôle—and it is one which he occupies with great ability, and brilliancy, and entire honor—is the rôle of a complainer, the rôle of an objector, a man most essential in all Governments, it is true; but the chronic critic never builds, never gets.

Mr. TILLMAN. If anybody wants any more in the way of criticism than I have indulged in this session, he is a very big glutton. That is all I have to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But, Mr. President, it is not such criticism which could surfeit us; it is not profitless complaint that the Senator should give us. We are not gluttons for that. Let him once give us a resolution or information which constitutes real food for legislation, and he will find this side greedy for all he can supply. But the Senator throws in things that nobody can do anything with, and then occupies the time, most profitably to his party and the country, in being a general objector to everything that is done, no matter whether it is right or whether it is wrong.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do; certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The joint resolution instructing the Department of Justice to take such steps as in its judgment are necessary and desirable to protect the rights of the United States in the public domain, or in the land granted to the railroads in Oregon, is the work of the Senator from South Carolina, and the Senate adopted it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I congratulate the Senator upon it. Now, let him put one in directing the Department of Justice to proceed, and I will support him. That is the trouble. The Senator does not go far enough.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, will the Senator get the Committee on Public Lands or the Committee on the Judiciary to support it? I do not want his individual vote. It is not worth a snap of beans. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is worth one vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. With a two-thirds vote on that side, you know that the minority is powerless except to criticise.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not object to the Senator's criticism. What I ask is that the Senator's criticism shall be fruitful. I have pointed out that the Senator has denounced the President for the very things for which the stock gamblers and wrongdoers of this country denounce him; on the other hand, I have pointed out that the Senator has complained of the President as a nonenforcer of laws, when he has enforced them more than any President that we have ever had; and I have pointed out that the Senator blames and attacks the President for sending to this Congress messages commending to the Senator laws which he approves, messages which the Constitution commands him to send to us, but which the Senator denounces him for sending.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not attacked the President for anything of that kind. I was attacking the President for the statement in a newspaper yesterday that he had ordered bills drawn by some of his underlings up there to submit to us to pass. I want to know the spaniel Senator who will bring them in.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, Mr. President, that term "spaniel Senator" has rolled three times from the tongue of the Senator from South Carolina. It is a Carlylean and Tillmanesque term, and I have no doubt that for several days the Senator has been concocting it. So let us watch for the "spaniel Senator" who shall dare to introduce a great measure of legislation demanded for the welfare of American business. Of course we can not expect the Senator from South Carolina to support it, because his attitude unfortunately seems to be, much as I admire and like him, that when the word "business" is mentioned, right or wrong, the Senator is up in arms against it. [Laughter.] Business is to the Senator a baneful word.

Mr. President, about the criticisms of the President, we have all read American history—not one of us perhaps more than another—and this one thing we know, that every great President this country has ever had, that every great leader of the American people who has made an assault upon intrenched privilege and insisted upon the rights of the American masses has been attacked. It was so with Washington. They charged him with wanting to become a king. They assailed him so that that great soul, who felt for nothing but for the welfare of the country in whose liberation he had led, actually said, "I wish to God I were dead and in my grave." They attacked him so that resolutions were passed when he ceased to be President, thanking God that George Washington no longer afflicted the country.

Then came the next great heroic figure among American Presidents, the greatest Democrat, excepting only Jefferson, the nation ever produced—a Democrat in name only, however, but in everything that constitutes the substance of Republican principles one of the first of great Republicans—Andrew Jackson. He was a despot, his maligners said; he was going to crush the liberties of the country, they declared. Last year I read, with that thrilling interest which such a perusal always inspires, of the attack upon that great popular leader made in this Chamber by Henry Clay; and later, another one made by Daniel Webster; and I could put them side by side in parallel columns with the attacks that are to-day made upon Theodore Roosevelt, and you would not have to change a word. "Jackson," said Clay, just as the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from South Carolina say of the President, "is usurping all the prerogatives of the legislative department." "Jackson," they declared, "is ruining American liberty." "Jackson," they said, "is paving the way for a despotism, and will ultimately seat himself upon the throne of kingly power." Does that sound familiar to gentlemen who are rehearsing, in rather fainter echoes, the thunders of that great eloquence directed against Andrew Jackson years and years ago?

Then we come to Lincoln. Lincoln! What was the familiar name applied to him, who, his critics said, overrode the Constitution, and who, his maligners declared, was destroying the permanent liberty of the American people in trying to strike the shackles from the black slaves and to save the Union intact and unimpaired? The word, with its malignant echoes, still lingers in the atmosphere. "Tyrant" was the title that they pinned upon the breast of the great martyr, and finally, when Booth struck him down, the words upon the lips of the assassin were "Sic semper tyrannis"—Thus always to tyrants.

So, Mr. President, in these latter-day and feebler attacks upon Theodore Roosevelt we have seen no new spectacle; we are beholding no new drama. It is not an original production. Senators are reciting ancient rhetoric when they denounce that great man, who gathers into his breast the thoughts, the purposes, the hopes, the rightousness and aspirations of the American people—Theodore Roosevelt. All your speeches, gentlemen, have been made before—against Washington, against your own great leader, Jackson, and against Lincoln, that greatest humanist but One mankind has ever known. Mr. President, this is an old story. There is no veteran Senator here who has not heard it with his own ears.

But if we want to come to an autocrat; if we really wish to discuss kinship and subserviency, the Senator's own side furnishes an example of both, and a recent illustration illuminates that example. If there has ever been an intellectual tyrant, if there has ever been an autocrat of will, it is the man who twice was the Senator's candidate for President, and twice defeated, and is soon again to be the Senator's candidate for President, and again defeated—"the peerless one," William Jennings Bryan. He yields nothing in his opinions, even when events have proved him wrong. He announced himself in favor of free silver coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1, without the consent of any other nation in the world, and although this country and the whole earth have long since passed that curious episode in economics, still the Senator's leader clings to it with the stubbornness of a heroic morality, but with the fatuity of mistaken fanaticism.

Mr. Bryan, the Senator's political master, yields nothing with reference to any position he ever takes. I admire his courage. I like his humanity. But when the Senator talks of the autocracy of a man who never consults with anybody, who never yields to anything, not even to events, and who conquers all of his opponents in his own party with the force of his overwhelming and juggernaut will, he could have really had in mind only the candidate of his own party for President, Mr. Bryan, who in his overpowering determination is a righteous Abdul Hamid, a humanity-loving Ghengis Khan. Mr. Bryan is the best illustration of autocracy—let the Senator address himself, upon that subject, to his political captain and master.

We have heard about conferences at the White House. We have heard that the President of the United States actually had the audacity to inform himself from any source he could before making a recommendation to the Senate; and when, because they are wise for the whole people, we support measures that are thus well digested, we are called spineless and subservient.

Washington itself has recently witnessed a real example of subserviency in the Senator's own ranks, without any of the perfect reasons we have for harmony with the President. Recently the papers have been full of the fact that William J. Bryan was a burden upon the shoulders of the Democratic party; he was "the old man of the sea," whom even the broad shoulders of the Senator from South Carolina were unable to dislodge; and in the absence of the peerless one, Senators got together—so the newspapers informed us—and said, "Ah, wait until we see Bryan. We will tell him not to run." And then, feeding upon itself, this resolution grew.

The Senator from Rhode Island will remember that just before the last campaign there was a conference of certain plutocrats from New York, who financed the last Democratic campaign, in the office of a Senator on the other side, the purpose of which was to lay plans to rid the Democratic party of the peerless leader; and they did. They did, and it came to naught. With Parker, the "safe and sane" candidate of reaction, Democracy met its worst defeat. I would not, under any circumstances, do Mr. Bryan an injustice, pure and brave as I believe him to be; and as between Bryan and Parker, if I had to choose, I would either leave the country or take Bryan.

But Senators on the other side met gravely. The cares of state sat upon their brows. Their hairs grew grayer thinking of that tremendous moment when in their patriotic resolution and the fealty to their party they should meet this man and tell him not to run.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator seems to have ascertained about it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know only what the newspapers said, just as the Senator from South Carolina knows from the newspapers about Roosevelt. I will give the Senator a chance to testify, because he was there. These men were there, and they were going to dispose of Mr. Bryan.

Mr. TILLMAN. I never attended—— [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And he came; and everybody waited with bated breath to see this man, who so often had led to defeat the Senators who were so anxious to get a chance at the public trough. We waited with bated breath to see them unhorse him. We waited to see the spectacle of that proud leader prostrate, his sword broken, giving his surrender to the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Georgia, the Senator from Mississippi, and the other cohorts of wisdom who wanted to save the Democratic party by getting hold of that man who had been their leader and forcing him to yield. And Mr. Bryan came.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—— [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Unless the Senator will stand sponsor for the story that the Senator from South Carolina attended a conference of that sort, he has no right to assert it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The only right I have——

Mr. TILLMAN. You have used my name. I stand here and tell you to your teeth that I have never attended any conference against Mr. Bryan.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator need not tell me to my teeth. He can tell me to my ears. [Laughter.] That is sufficient. I acquit the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not believe any such conference was ever held.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know whether the Senator attended this conference or not. Let me describe it.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. McLAURIN. My name has been mentioned as one of the Senators who attended a conference of that kind. [Laughter.] I neither attended it nor did I know that there was such a conference held until the Senator from Indiana stated it. And while this is a beautiful speech he is making and I am enjoying it very much, I want to know what that has to do with the late panic we had, and how is it going to remove the danger of another panic?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, no! What the Senator really wants to know is what that has to do with money based upon cotton as security? [Laughter.] I know what is in the Senator's mind. We have two Senators issuing a general denial. "One by one the sparrows fall." [Laughter.]

Mr. McLAURIN. Money based upon cotton would be far better than the clearing-house certificates of the last panic.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the Senator will agree with me that there is a form of currency better than both. But I would not rob the Senator of a single intellectual laurel which is rightly his as the originator of the novel scheme of having the American people issue their currency on what he says is that indestructible and indispensable necessity of civilization—the cotton of the South. He is entitled to the credit.

Mr. McLAURIN. I should like to know how my proposition to issue money on cotton in preference to money on railroad bonds has anything to do with proving that there was a conference between Colonel Bryan and certain Senators.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will come to that in a moment. I will put the Senator upon the witness stand. I am perfectly willing to receive, one by one, the general denial of every Senator upon the other side. It only shows that the fright they actually received when the "peerless one" got here still lingers with them.

I have no authority except the authority that the Senator from South Carolina says he has for criticising the White House conference. I have only the authority of the newspapers. But the facts are—and if they are not the Senators can deny them; I do not blame them for denying them, in view of coming events. The Senators want "to stand in." They want to be on harmonious terms with their candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If I had anticipated that this reference to the dinner at Newlands would have caused all this disturbance on the Democratic side, I never would have mentioned it. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in undertaking to place us in the attitude of currying favor with the man whom the Senator has already doomed to defeat his logic is fearful.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No more fearful than the Senator's criticism.

Mr. McLAURIN. I want to say, with reference to my denial of the Senator's charge that I was in a conference the purpose of which was to dissuade Colonel Bryan from becoming the candidate of the Democratic party at the next election, had I sat still in my seat and permitted that to go unchallenged, it might have been taken as an admission on my part that it was true.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I acquit the Senator——

Mr. McLAURIN. I deny it for that reason.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I see from the book the Senator has in his hand that he has kept a diary upon this subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. McLAURIN. No, sir; I have no diary. I have a diary of the Republican party.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator would have to have an American history to have a diary of the Republican party.

Mr. McLAURIN. Let me get through with that reference to the diary. I have no diary here except the diary of the Republican party. I have the platform of the Republican party. In 1904 the Republican platform said:

The Democratic party during the same period—

That is, since the war—

has had complete control [of the Government] for only two years.

If that be true, as they claim, and I take it from their own testimony, then while they are claiming whatever of good things have happened under Republican administrations, may they not also be charged with the bad things that have occurred, including the recent panic?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will depend upon the Senator to charge the Republican party with anything and everything, whether there is foundation for it or not.

But since the Senator has read from the diary in my time, referring to the historic Belshazzar feast, when they saw the handwriting on the wall, will he kindly rise and take my time and tell the Senate and the American people what they did even during those two years? I wait for an answer.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The only thing the Senator's party did during those two years that has become historic was the pulling down of the American flag in Hawaii, which a Republican President had to restore.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not desire to take the Senator's time for anything. Whenever I desire to speak of the Democratic administration or the Republican administration I can speak of them in my own time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is welcome to mine if he can name a single thing during those years which the Democratic party did.

Mr. McLAURIN. I will say this, if it will satisfy the Senator from Indiana—keeping the Republican party out of control and out of graft for two years was worth something. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. During those two years, such graft as Roosevelt exposed and punished in this Government existed then, and not one movement was made by the only Democratic President we have had since the civil war either to probe the graft, discover the grafters, or put them in prison, whereas during the present Administration, beginning with Machen clear down, the Republican Administration has pursued one undeviating policy—the pursuit of wrongdoers, no matter to what party or to what class they belonged; and when the Senator can show such a record as that he can go with more reason and hope for success before the masses of the American people.

The Senator certainly has learned through these long years of defeat that mere witticism, mere unfounded charges, mere rhetoric without facts back of them, without reason back of them, without laws passed, are not sufficient to secure the suffrages of the American people; and that is just what is the matter with the Senator's party.

But I am not going to be diverted, although I know the Senator would like to divert me, from what occurred in Washington at the Belshazzar feast. And I am speaking on the question of subserviency raised by the Senator from South Carolina. What happened when the great leader, the peerless one, the next candidate of the Democratic party, whom the Senators, as the newspapers said, wanted to get rid of, arrived in town?

It was common talk. All the correspondents had the story. They could not all be wrong at the same time about the same thing without being corrected about it. It was the subject of cartoons in the Washington papers. You were all going to tell Mr. Bryan to get out of it and save the Democratic party. He came. A dinner was given by one of the most charming hosts that Washington affords, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. His beautiful home overlooking that splendid landscape was to be the scene of this sacrifice. That was to be the conference room where it was to be imparted to Mr. Bryan that, in the interest of the Democratic party, he must not run. We waited. We watched the papers. We wanted to see the outcome. And when Mr. Bryan arrived in town the double-barreled dinner of discontent was held and not one barrel went off. [Laughter.]

There was something the matter with the Senators. Their courage oozed. Why did it ooze? Talk about autocracy! Talk about subserviency! It oozed because they were not able to stand up against that really mighty will that for twelve years has dominated them, that man who has held them all in the hollow of his hand. Subserviency! What was the attitude of those Democratic counselors who, when he was absent, were going to dispose of Mr. Bryan when they finally found him present? Subserviency, Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very glad to hear from the Senator from Maryland, who, I think, would be an excellent running mate with Mr. Bryan, and add very great weight to the ticket of Bryan and Rayner.

Mr. RAYNER. I decline the honor so unanimously tendered me. [Laughter.] I only want to say to the Senator from Indiana that I happened to be at this meeting, which he calls a "conference," and there is not a word of truth—not referring to his recital—in the statement that any one ever intended to ask Mr. Bryan to decline. There is not a single word of truth in it. If he builds his contention upon that foundation, the whole thing falls to the ground.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is the same kind of foundation that the Senator from South Carolina built his on.

Mr. RAYNER. If the Senator from South Carolina said what is inaccurate, that does not justify the Senator from Indiana in another inaccuracy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I quoted from the newspapers, and so did the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. RAYNER. The principal thing that took place in that conference was a discussion between Mr. Bryan and myself—and the Senator from Indiana agrees with him fully on that—in regard to the child-labor bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is one great thing to the credit of Mr. Bryan, and I never have, even in the heat of the campaign when he first ran for the Presidency, denounced Mr. Bryan as unrighteous or insincere. He occasionally gets right, and when he gets right I believe in giving him credit for it. The human heart of that man wants to end the murder and ruin of tens of thousands of American children. He deserves the applause and not the condemnation of the American people for that. If he went to the country upon other planks as righteous as that, planks that would appeal to the hearts and firesides of the nation, he would stand a much better chance of carrying the next election than he ever will.

Mr. RAYNER. And pass an absolutely unconstitutional measure for the purpose of accomplishing that object?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We will have that question up when we get to it, and if I am not able to show by the decisions of the Supreme Court the entire constitutionality of that measure, as well as by the laws now on the statute books, which even a corn-fed lawyer——

Mr. TILLMAN. Corn-field lawyer. [Laughter.] The Senator from Indiana has advertised himself through the magazines, or some of his overzealous friends have, as having been acquainted once with a yoke of oxen, having driven lumber wagons, and all that kind of thing. For a man who pretends to have been born on a farm to come here and talk about a corn-fed lawyer, when I said a corn-field lawyer, is simply a disgrace to his claim to be kin to the farm.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Undoubtedly that was a slip of the tongue, but, since I have come to think about it, a slip of the tongue undoubtedly subconsciously suggested by the entire appropriateness of the title. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Undoubtedly; and I love corn bread immensely. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So it is all right. In any event I pay tribute to the Senator's common sense. That is what the term "corn-field lawyer" means—common sense.

I want to say to the Senator from Maryland—whose great learning no man, even among his constituents, respects more than I do, but who sometimes takes a position so often taken by "constitutional lawyers"—where the word "constitutional" has quotation marks around it—that the Constitution is not a mysterious instrument, designed to prevent any human reform and all the progress of the people. It was not adopted by "constitutional" lawyers, but it was adopted by the people directly, and the so-called "cornfield lawyer" had more to do with it than all the "constitutional lawyers" who ever existed.

The Constitution is our fundamental law. It is what Marshall called it—not a contract between the States, but an ordinance of immortal national life marking out the great outlines of a government in terms so simple and so clear that the commonest of the common people for whom the Constitution was made can understand it. It is just this attitude of regarding the Constitution as some mysterious thing which is always being put up as a shield behind which some human wrong can hide that has brought the Constitution into all the disrespect that it has ever had at the hands of the American people.

Now, I come back to the Newlands dinner. The day came; the dinner was held; held in two sections, like a Pullman train. Whether or not the Senators—I take their word for it—had any intention of telling Mr. Bryan to retire, it was not carried out. However that may have been, however in complete error the newspaper correspondents of the Capital may have been about it, however wrong the whole country was about that, we must accept, and do accept, as they are, one by one filed in public in the Senate, the general denial of all the Senators upon the other side.

But, Mr. President, does any Senator upon the other side deny that, despite the constant counselings of the conservative and wise in their party, Mr. Bryan nevertheless will be their nominee? Would one of them dare question a single plank in his recent platform? No matter what may be their intellectual attitude, every one of them will follow that masterful will like good soldiers—I had almost said like subservient slaves.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator had better wait until after the Denver convention.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator doubt it?

Mr. TILLMAN. What?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The outcome of that convention.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Bryan may be the nominee, because I see nobody else in sight just now; but that does not mean that he is going to dictate the platform.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Think of the distress of a party numbering millions that sees no man in sight big enough to be President except a man who has twice been nominated and twice defeated for the Presidency. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Whose platform has been stolen by the god or demigod whom the Senator from Indiana worships.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There again is that question about the Democratic platform. The only complaint that the Senator from South Carolina really makes of us is that we have enacted into law something that they only talked about.

Mr. TILLMAN. We could not when the people would not give us the power.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Why would the people not give you the power?

Mr. TILLMAN. Because you had debauched them with your special class legislation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, then the most of the American people, according to the Senator's logic, are well affected and their prosperity helped by special class legislation.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If that is the case, does not the Senator think the American people know what is good for them?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; and the American people are going to turn you and your gang out. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator has repeated that prophecy for long years——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will suspend. The Chair will again admonish the occupants of the galleries that applause is forbidden under the rules of the Senate; and it is the duty of the Chair to enforce the Senate rules.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was just going to say that the Senator has made that prophecy heretofore. It puts me in mind of that famous poem of Poe's, you know—

Quoth the raven, "Nevermore."

Quoth the Senator, "Nevermore."

And not once has the prophecy come true. A prophet who has been discredited, notwithstanding the earnestness and multitude of his prophecies for eight long years, does not have much terror for us to-day.

The Senator said a curious thing, one upon which we can easily base the prophecy of the Senator that we are going to be turned out of power. He said nothing would be so good for the American people as the election of a Democratic President and House of Representatives, and then he gave the reason. The Senator will find it in the RECORD. He said, "because you Republicans have the Senate; and with a Democratic President and House of Representatives you Republican Senators will prevent any 'wild legislation'"—"wild legislation," the Senator said. "Wild legislation" proposed, I suppose, by the Democratic President whom the Senator foretells. The safety of the country, then, according to the Senator from South Carolina, consists exclusively in the fact that if they elect a Democratic President and House there still is, thank God, the Republican Senate to prevent them passing what the Senator calls "wild legislation."

Mr. TILLMAN. What does the Senator say about the other part of that statement?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What was the other part of it?

Mr. TILLMAN. That it would give an opportunity for a backbone to grow up the spinal cord of those on the other side who now have nothing but cotton strings.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator used that term before; but I have just shown him what kind of backbone Senators on that side had when Mr. Bryan confronted them.

But harmony on this side with the President is not subservience. Agreement upon that side to Mr. Bryan when you really do not want him is subservience. What would the Senator have? Would he have the Republican Senate and House at war with the Republican President? That is what he would have as a partisan leader. But what he would have as an American patriot is that harmony between the Republican Senate and House and the Republican President which really exists. If the Senator thinks we are going into the next campaign or any campaign divided he is mistaken. We will rally around a single standard bearer and march, with the ranks closed, to victory, appealing to the people upon the record of laws passed and deeds done for the welfare of the people.

Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina said what a splendid thing it would be for the American people if the Democrats were to elect the President and House. As he spoke I just thought of what would happen to the country. First of all, the Senator said the country would be safe, because we Republican Senators would prevent "wild legislation," and so the country would be safe. The inference from that is that the Democratic President would propose nothing but "wild legislation," and therefore, you proposing and we opposing, the country for four long years would have nothing done at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. Except the execution of the laws.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Except the execution of the laws, which were never before in our history executed better, according to the records and by the number of suits brought and the convictions had. Does that appeal very well as a campaign cry to the American people? Four years with nothing done, with no legislation passed to help business, and nothing at all done except "wild legislation," to use the term of the Senator, proposed by the Democratic President and killed by the Republican Senate. If the Senator thinks he can go to the American people upon that platform I wish him joy of journey.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President—— [Laughter.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is it within the comprehension of the Senator from Indiana that in commonwealths like his own used to be, where the parties are so evenly balanced, both have to be on their good behavior and nominate none but clean, honorable men for office? Is it within the purview of his comprehension that with a divided Congress, one-half acting as a holdback, so to speak, and the other trying to press forward, a condition of compromise might be reached which would be wise and for the best interests of the country? Is that beyond his comprehension?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Ah, Mr. President, then the Senator's platform in one brief hour has shifted. First, it was nothing doing, because "wild legislation" would be proposed which we would defeat; and, second, it is "compromise." If those two words emblazoned upon the Democratic banner will cheer his hosts to victory, I think it will be the first time that ever such a motto was put forth with such a result.

The Senator spoke about States being evenly divided and all that sort of thing. Is it not curious how States have ceased to be evenly divided? Is it not strange how the Republican majorities have rolled up, increasing year by year, in spite of the Senator's prophecy of defeat for us? Why, Mr. President, the people who gave those votes were what the Senator from South Carolina calls "ignorant masses," very "poor, simple souls," according to the Senator.

But, as a matter of fact, the American people are not the "ignorant masses," as the Senator now calls them. The combined intelligence and massed morality of the American people is the greatest force for wisdom and righteousness in all the world to-day or that history ever saw. I never shall forget when that man whose memory we all hold dear, and whom I regard as the greatest constructive legislator of the last half century, Senator Platt of Connecticut, told me this concerning these American masses. He said: "I can always rise in the American Senate and I can speak without faltering or fear; but whenever I rise to speak to an audience of American farmers, I never speak without hesitation and trembling."

They are not the "ignorant masses." They read and think, and they know what is best for them; and reading, thinking, and knowing what is best for them, they have for eight long years rolled up Republican majorities that have swept States out of the doubtful column and placed them permanently in the Republican ranks. It is the wisdom of the American people. it is the righteousness of the Senator's so-called "ignorant masses," it is their information that has given us the victory in the past, and it is those great qualities of popular virtue that will give us victory in the future.

Picture the Cabinet, Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina could have his wish. President, Mr. Bryan. Cabinet: Secretary of the Treasury, BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN, of South Carolina; Attorney-General, George Fred Williams, of Massachusetts; Secretary of War and Secretary of State, anybody who would take the job, with nothing to do. [Laughter.] Motto of the Administration: "Pull down business at home and pull down the flag abroad." [Laughter.] Because that is the sum and substance of the platform of the peerless one as recently announced in Nebraska, and to which the Senator subscribes.

Well, Mr. President, the country will have to face no such catastrophe. No; the people will continue marching forward, under Republican leadership, upon that ever-ascending path of wisdom, honesty, and righteousness which Theodore Roosevelt has marked out for them, and marching so they will march to victory. The Senator must postpone his prophecy for at least twelve years.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAPP. I call up the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to two provisions in the report of the conference committee and to ask their consideration at this time before the adoption of the report. The Senate adopted what is designated in the reprint of the bill as amendment No. 59, which is found in the print of the bill on page 48.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator kindly call attention to the page of the RECORD?

Mr. HEYBURN. The report not having been printed, I am obliged to refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. CLAPP. But I ask what page of the RECORD?

Mr. HEYBURN. Page 3253. It is amendment No. 59, on page 48 of the bill as printed when it left the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. I did not hear the number of the page of the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. Page 3253, near the top of the second column.

Mr. CLAPP. I have it now.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, as the amendment left the Senate it provided, among other things, that the Secretary of the Interior should make the same arrangement with the Indians in regard to the irrigation of the land that he made with other persons. I desire to direct the attention of Senators to the change made in the conference report in this provision, as I regard it as very important in the interest of the Indians that they should be treated the same as white people are treated under the same circumstances.

Mr. CLAPP. There is such confusion in the Chamber I will ask the Senator again to state the number of the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is the fifty-ninth amendment. If the Senator has a copy of the print of the bill as it left the Senate it affords a more ready reference. The conference committee have added certain words to the amendment as it left the Senate which, in my judgment, would very seriously militate against the interests of these Indians and place them at the mercy of uncertain and unvarying conditions.

Mr. TELLER. It is the fifty-ninth amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, the fifty-ninth, on page 48. The conferees have added the words that I shall read. After the word "make," which is said to be in line 10, but in the print of the bill as it left the Senate it is in line 20——

Mr. CLAPP. I think that is correct. It should be line 10, as the reference is to the line of the amendment, and not to the page of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand; but I was making an explanation in order that Senators who have the RECORD before them could find it. In lieu of the provision that the Senate agreed upon, that these Indians should be treated as other people, the conferees propose to insert the words that the Secretary shall make—

Such arrangement and agreement in reference thereto as said Secretary deems for the best interest of the Indians.

Those words embody the very principle that the Senate expressed when it struck out the language which was stricken from the bill when it was up for consideration. In other words, it cuts the Indian out of consideration entirely. He is left with nothing to say but to acccept the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior.

I desire to recall to the attention of Senators the fact that this is dealing with allotted and patented lands belonging to the Indians. The bill, as it came from the committee and from the House, did exactly what the conference committee have done in effect—it left the Indians with nothing to say. But the bill as it came from the House did provide that these holdings should be cut down from 160 acres to 10 acres, then leaving the manner of the application of the water to the Department. However, the Senate struck out that provision, leaving the Indian allotments to stand as they were patented to them—at 160 acres—and allowing them to participate in the making of the contract or arrangement under which water should be furnished to the lands.

In proposing the amendment which the Senate adopted I considered it of very great importance that these Indians should have some say and be consulted as to the terms and conditions upon which the water of this reclamation project would be applied to their lands. I did not expect them not to contribute toward the exepense. In the amendment which we adopted it was provided that they should be dealt with just as other people were; if the application of water created a burden of $30 an acre upon the lands of the white man it would create a burden of $30 an acre upon the lands of the Indian. Whatever the terms might be, they should be the same because the title of the Indian is a fee-simple title just as is the title of the white man, and because the Government comes and forces (if I may use that term, which is a little strong) this improvement upon the Indian, and they should not be allowed to improve him out of his estate.

The original bill undertook to place the price of the application of the water at 150 acres out of 160 acres of land; in other words, to take all of the Indian's land but 10 acres. The Senate disagreed to that and amended the bill so that the Indian retained his 160 acres of land on the same terms and conditions as the white man retained his. That is justice, and it has met with the approval of this body, and it would meet with the approval of all fair-minded men.

The conference committee proposes to give the Indian no definite right, no right to participate in the determination of this question at all. It does not provide that it shall be upon such terms as the Secretary of the Interior and the Indians may agree upon, but it confines it to the Secretary of the Interior. That is not fair. If you treat the Indians in this way, Mr. President, you set an example for the Indians that would eventually result in their absolute destitution. That is what it would amount to, because they are not personally capable of managing themselves such matters of large business scope. It would be a shame to send a bill out of Congress that would refuse to recognize their right even to be consulted in dealing with this subject. The Secretary of the Interior might conclude that the measure which met his approval, taking 150 out of the 160 acres, was a fair way to deal with it. I do not propose to leave it to him to do it.

Mr. TELLER. Are not the 160 acres still left to the Indian in the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; it gives the Secretary of the Interior the power, without consulting the Indians at all, to place any condition in land or dollars that he may choose. That is what I object to.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, I think this matter can be very easily straightened out.

The bill as it came from the Committee on Indian Affairs provided that the Secretary could cancel allotments. There was a question whether it attempted to clothe him with that authority independent of the willingness of the Indian to consent to the cancellation.

Associated with that thought was the question of the area of the land which the Indian should retain. Under the irrigation law the land may be reduced by agreement to 10 acres, which is the lowest area permitted. The Senate amended the committee report so as to leave it a matter of agreement between the Indian and the Department, eliminating what I understood at the time and what I think the Senate generally understood was the objectionable feature, which sought to clothe the Secretary with the power to cancel these allotments irrespective of the wish of the Indian.

Mr. HEYBURN. May I ask the Senator a question here, because it is applicable at this point?

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under the general irrigation law the Secretary of the Interior is given power to cut what are called the "units of land" down even to 10 acres. The Senator from Colorado has suggested to me that this would still prevent the Secretary from cutting down the area of the Indian, but I have in mind the general power which the Secretary possesses under the provisions of the reclamation act to cut these units down to 10 acres. I do not believe that in the case of these Indians he should be given that power, and it was with the reclamation act in view that I proposed the amendment originally.

Mr. CLAPP. Then, Mr. President, if we have not taken that power from him by our conference report, it is because we are unable to employ language that would take it from him. Under the bill as reported by the committee the question might have arisen, Was it not attempted to give him the power to do this as he saw fit? But in the amendment which is reported back in the agreement of the conferees it reads that he is authorized to make "such arrangement and agreement in reference thereto."

Mr. HEYBURN. "Thereto" relates back.

Mr. CLAPP. To the question of irrigation.

No authority is given the Secretary here, nor would we for one moment contemplate giving him the authority on his own part, without agreement with the Indians to say how much of the Indians' land should be taken in lieu of irrigation being placed upon the balance. But the language is—

Such arrangement and agreement in reference thereto as said Secretary deems for the best interest of the Indians.

Now, that involves, first, the consent of the Indian to the agreement, and leaves it optional with the Secretary to ignore the ordinary rule in regard to irrigation and agree to any amount that shall be left as the irrigable land of the Indian which the Indian is willing to agree to, whether it is 10 acres or the entire 160 acres. Instead of limiting the right of the Indian to contract it recognizes his right to contract; but as a matter of law the authority to the Secretary must come from Congress, and it is so framed.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me, the word "thereto," as I understand it, is the dangerous word in that sentence—

Such arrangement and agreement in reference thereto.

That refers back to the provision of this section contained in lines 14, 15, 16, and 17, which relate in express terms to the reclamation act and would carry the provisions of the reclamation act into this amendment. That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. CLAPP. No; it would if this clause were not in, but this leaves a latitude to the Secretary in dealing with Indian lands for irrigation that he does not have in dealing with the white man—to still protect the Indian so far as the Indian's consent must be obtained to the arrangement.

Mr. TELLER. To all parts of the arrangement?

Mr. CLAPP. To all parts of the arrangement.

Now, one step farther. It may be said that when an Indian takes his allotment and takes his right of citizenship he should be placed on the same plane with the white man. But the committee, out of extra caution, recognizing that it takes some time for the Indian to learn to safeguard against the demands upon his lands, took out of the $200,000 which is otherwise appropriated by the bill for the irrigation of Indian lands and gave the authority to the Secretary to use $12,000 a year of that sum for the purpose of aiding these Indians in the irrigation of their land.

It seems to me that from the Senator's own standpoint of safeguarding the interests of the Indian instead of leaving him and leaving the Secretary to the ironclad law that now exists we have still preserved to the Indian the right that no condition can be imposed except by his agreement. We have enlarged the right of the Secretary, and have for the time being safeguarded the Indian against losing his land by his inability to meet the demands upon it coming from the increased cost by reason of the irrigation.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator has said much to satisfy my mind as to the intent of the committee. Of course it will be admitted that this will repeal the restrictive clause in the bill providing for the allotment of lands against alienation by the Indian.

Mr. CLAPP. To the extent that the Secretary and the Indian make this agreement.

Mr. HEYBURN. It gives the Secretary the absolute power to repeal in effect the restriction against alienation by the Indian.

Mr. CLAPP. Could the Senator imagine any provision which would allow of an arrangement to take allotted land that is simply held at present under the trust allotment, not yet patented, and subject it to irrigation that would not involve a release of the restriction upon alienation as to the land in excess of that which the Indian retains?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. I can not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not mean by that that I can. I understand what the Senator says in regard to it. I merely want it made clear in the RECORD here so there may be no question, if it comes up for subsequent consideration, as to the position of the Senate in regard to the bill. It does in effect to the extent that the size of the allotment may be cut down, repeal the prohibitive clause against alienation by the Indians, because it would give the Indian the right, through an arrangement with the Secretary of the Interior, to dispose of an unlimited proportion of this land. It is quite important in the enactment of this class of legislation that in the discussion of it it be made plain as to what the intent of the legislation was.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that under the existing allotment law that power is vested in the Secretary.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not as to Indian lands.

Mr. CLAPP. As to allotments.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under the allotment law that power is vested in the Secretary except within the limitations expressed in the law itself.

Mr. CLAPP. But he is the judge of the limitation absolutely.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the Secretary may not, under the existing allotment law, allot 10 acres to an Indian.

Mr. CLAPP. Not to the extent of releasing restrictions upon any allotments as to alienation.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, of course, upon conditions.

Mr. CLAPP. No; the only condition is the condition which the Secretary of the Interior himself determines.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, the condition is in consideration of the act, and if the Secretary of the Interior finds that the condition exists he may do it.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. The amendment which the Senate passed in express terms contemplated the exercise of this same power, because you can not work out an irrigation scheme or plan—I prefer to use that word—you can not work out an irrigation plan with allotted lands held in trust, unless it involves the release of that portion of those lands which no longer remain the property of the allottee. Under the amendment as it passed the Senate the Secretary is authorized to make the same agreement with such allottees as he makes with other persons. Unless that amendment carried authority to the Secretary to allow the Indian whose allotment of 160 acres was to become a part of the irrigation project to alienate that portion of it which he did not retain, it would be absolutely void.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I had it in mind, in drawing that amendment, that the Indian should be allowed to release a certain portion of his land, but I wanted to place the limitation at the area that a white man retains. That was all. In using that language I meant that the Indian should have the same rights. I think myself that if the white people within that reclamation project are allowed but 80 acres, it would be fair enough to allow the Indian the same. I do not, however, want the Indian limited to 10 acres and the white man limited to 80 acres or to any greater area.

Mr. CLAPP. You can not limit it unless they agree to it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, they are fixing the units where the land is to be taken up for reclamation where the title has not passed. Of course a great deal of this land is in that position, and land that will be taken up by the white man within this reclamation project will be taken up without any restriction as to units other than those which the law fixes.

With these explanations and with this consideration of record, I am not disposed to press an objection here that would send this bill back to the committee of conference for further consideration so far as this amendment is concerned.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I believe the proper construction to be put upon this amendment is that put upon it by the chairman of the committee, and I wish to commit myself to that. I believe that is what is intended, and that is the way I hope the Department will rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, resting in that assurance, I have no further objection to make to the report of the conference committee in regard to that amendment; but the amendment found on page 3253 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which pertains to the creation of the national park in the Coeur d'Alene Indian Reservation is of more importance, because there the conference committee have changed——

Mr. TELLER. What is the number of that amendment, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is No. 35.

Mr. CLAPP. At the foot of page 22 of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. There the Senate adopted an amendment creating a national park of about 7,000 acres in north Idaho, covering a point particularly adapted for park purposes. The Senate amendment provided that the Indians should be paid a dollar and a quarter an acre for that land, which would amount to a comparatively small sum, but it left the title to that park in the Government of the United States. It is conceded both by the conference committee and by the Senate that that park is a proper subject of legislation, and that it is wise to have a park there. It covers three lakes, part of a mountain, and a part of a river, and its establishment is conceded everywhere to be a very desirable thing.

Mr. President, the conference committee have substituted a provision that the State may buy this land for a park. That would require action by the legislature of the State, and it would raise the question of whether the State may appropriate money for that purpose. When the constitution of Idaho was adopted it was intended to so frame it that the State could not engage in that kind of business; that money might not be appropriated for such a purpose. This would require a construction of the constitution of the State of Idaho that would allow the legislature to appropriate a sum of money for the purpose of purchasing from the Government of the United States this park. In the first place, I do not care to embarrass the acquisition of that park by any such question. In the second place, I do not believe in creating a park that shall be the property of the State. We have all had some experience, not only in those Western States but elsewhere, with parks and enterprises of that kind that belong to a State or are under the control of a State, as to the effect they have upon the internal affairs and management, political and otherwise, of the State. They are always a subject of political embarrassment. A park of 8,000 acres would call for administration and protection. Every legislature would be required to consider it, and the determination of the class of amusements and the manner of the use of such a park are often embarrassing questions. I want in Idaho one United States park.

Mr. TELLER. I do not want any in Colorado.

Mr. HEYBURN. You have one in Colorado.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. For a moment.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Idaho has completely answered his own position in his statement here as to the power of the State under the Constitution. The conferees were confronted by this situation: Here was a proposition to buy a park and pay for it out of the Treasury of the United States. The conferees—without going into the details of the conference—could not maintain that provision in the bill. It being a Senate amendment, the Senate conferees, of course, could not of their own motion do that. It was suggested that we put the provision in this form, and then the Senators from the State of Idaho, if they saw fit to avail themselves of it, could do so; and, if they did not—we were not in a position to consult with the Senator at the time, he being out of town, for I myself made inquiry as to his whereabouts—and if they did not, all they would have to do would be for the State to decline to act under this provision, and the Senator then can try to get a bill passed creating a national park at national expense.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have already passed such a bill in the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. As an amendment to this bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. We also passed it as an independent measure.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him there——

Mr. CLAPP. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The question as to whether this is to be a national park or a State park is an important question; but it is also important that it be decided quickly, because I am advised by a letter to-day that the allotment of land to these Indians will commence on the ground not later than the 1st of April, which is only about two weeks off.

Mr. TELLER. They will not take this park, will they?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Indians are entitled now to locate their lands anywhere. Of course there is a large excess of land in this reservation. This is not a large band, and the Indian allotments will probably not exceed ten or eleven hundred. There is plenty of extra land, but some of the Indians might want to take allotments on the land on which it is proposed to locate this park. You can not control the selection of the Indian in taking his allotment, unless the law shall have segregated a portion of the land.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator certainly is no worse off than if the Senate conferees had receded from this amendment, which they would have been obliged to do under the circumstances. With this provision in the bill, they would hardly proceed to allotment, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] suggests. If we had simply receded, the case would have been no different practically from what it is now, without the power on the part of Idaho to act, except that this does temporarily suspend, or I think it would suspend, the allotment of those lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would inquire of the Senator from Minnesota whether or not, in his judgment, the adoption of this provision in this report would not stay action on the independent bill which we passed in the Senate and which is pending before the other House?

Mr. CLAPP. Supposing it would, if the Senate had receded from its amendment but one of two things could have resulted. We could have come back here for instructions, which would have delayed this matter, pending which allotments might have been taken, or we could have simply adopted the report on our receding from the amendment, which would have left the matter entirely out of the pale of this bill.

I tried to reach the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], as I always do a Senator from any State whose local interests are being affected in conference or in the preparation of a bill, but was unable to reach him, he being out of town.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was not in town on that day.

Mr. CLAPP. No; the Senator was out of town.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had gone to a neighboring city.

Mr. CLAPP. It seemed to me, then, that rather than recede it would be better to put this provision in; to suspend, so far as it would, operations there, leaving the representatives of that State, if they can, to secure the passage of such a bill as they desire through the other House.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, Mr. President, I am not disposed to prolong this discussion under the statement made by the chairman of the committee. I am pleased to have made a record that will explain the reason the bill reached this position, because I had undertaken to secure legislation that would give us a national park in North Idaho. This provision would give us a State park, and we may get a national park through the bill which is pending in the other House.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, my attention has just been called to the fact that two or three items affecting the Indians in my State, which were inserted in the Senate as amendments, have been left out of the bill by the conferees; or, in other words, the amendments have been receded from. I do not know what the formal motion for me to make would be, but I apprehend it would be to disagree to the report of the Senate conferees as to certain amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The form of the question is, Shall the Senate agree to the conference report? And, of course, the negative of that would defeat the report.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course the Senator is aware—and I presume the same rule obtains in the other House—that no matter what may prompt a motion, it has to be as to the entire report. The amendments can not be separated.

Mr. DIXON. They can not be separated?

Mr. CLAPP. No; and I do not suppose that can be done in the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The only question before the Senate upon the conference report is, Will the Senate agree to the report?

Mr. DIXON. And not to an individual amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Not to an individual amendment, or to any specific item.

Mr. DIXON. Then, Mr. President, I certainly am opposed at this time to agreeing to the conference report on this bill, especially directing my objection to the report as to Senate amendments numbered 49, 52, and 53.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Before the Senator takes that position I want to suggest that our Calendar every morning here shows the announcement of some Senator who has given notice that he desires to speak. That forces me practically, out of courtesy, to defer action upon this report until after the speech or speeches of the day have been made. This matter has now lain over for several days and I fear that a roll call might disclose the want of a quorum. I certainly hope the Senator will not press the question under these circumstances.

Mr. DIXON. I would not press the question except for the reason that I think the entire report submitted by the Interior Department in reference to these matters has been overlooked in the preparation of the report of the conferees. Here are three different items especially recommended by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and by the Secretary of the Interior, reported unanimously from the Indian Committee, and not a question raised on the floor of the Senate regarding them; and yet I find for the first time they have been disagreed to in conference.

Mr. CLAPP. As to the amendment providing for the employment of "line riders" in the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation, there is no impropriety in my stating that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was present and furnished a written statement concerning all these items; but, notwithstanding his presence, it was impossible for the Senate conferees to retain them. The same is true as to the amendment increasing the salary of the agent at the Flathead Agency.

Mr. DIXON. As to the Flathead Agency I find that other amendments of similar nature have been retained by the conferees, especially those pertaining to agencies in South Dakota, in one instance the salary of the agent being raised from $1,800 to $2,200. Here is an agent in my State, in charge of one of the five most important agencies in Montana, receiving the pitiful compensation of $1,500.

Mr. TELLER. On what page is the amendment?

Mr. DIXON. It is Senate amendment No. 49 on page 35. The agent is stationed at a reservation that is just being opened, where there are 2,200 Indians with their land allotted and with property amounting to six or seven million dollars held in trust, with this man as the fiscal agent. There is a very strong recommendation for the adoption of the amendment and commendation of it from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The amendment only proposes to increase the agent's salary to $1,800.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, in answer to that I will say that the Senate put an amendment on this bill which provides that the Government shall pay the cost of the bond which the Indian agent gives. The salaries of two or three agents had been raised prior to the adoption of that amendment, but after its adoption the conferees decided to take out amendments increasing the salaries of agents, as they figured that the difference in the cost of the bond would about equal the proposed increase of salary.

Mr. DIXON. I want to say in this connection that an amendment has been retained in the bill increasing the salary of an agent in South Dakota from $1,800 to $2,200 without any question being raised. In this case the agent has absolute charge of 2,200 Indians and their families and a trust fund of $8,000,000. All four of the Montana amendments, except the one in regard to the Fort Belknap Indians, have been stricken from the bill.

Mr. TELLER. They are all legislation.

Mr. DIXON. I do not think they are all legislation.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator will bear in mind that one of the four was very probably legislation, although I was very favorable to it getting through on the appropriation bill because of the difficulty of passing it as a separate measure. But the conferees did the best they possibly could.

Mr. DIXON. Here is another item appropriating $30,000 for the purchasing of lands for a roving band of homeless Chippewa Indians known as "Rocky Boy's band." Both the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs submitted favorable reports on this item, but it has been stricken from the bill, and in lieu thereof the Secretary has been instructed to investigate the matter. I want to say in that regard that the report from the Secretary of the Interior, covering five or six pages, especially recited the fact that this matter had been investigated two or three years ago by a special agent of the Department, and that this very recommendation was made by the special agent and concurred in by the Secretary of the Interior. Now, the conference report proposes to strike out that amendment, which is No. 53, and to refer the matter back to the Secretary—to ask him to do what has already been done and what his report shows was done two or three years ago.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, that is undoubtedly true from the standpoint of the Senator, but, unfortunately, the evidence before the committee rendered it somewhat difficult for the Senate conferees to make the point perhaps as strong as they might otherwise have made it. It was very incomplete, and failed to show the number of these Indians, as I recall; and, above all, while there was a recommendation that this money was to be appropriated, it failed to show any tentative proposition as to where these Indians could be placed. It was thought best by the House conferees to send this matter to the Secretary of the Interior for a complete report. With a tentative arrangement, then the money could be appropriated.

Mr. DIXON. But, if the Senator will permit me the suggestion, Senate amendment No. 53 makes the appropriation and instructs the Secretary. It authorizes him to locate these Indians wherever he can find convenient land and water, either on the reservation or off. It gives him carte blanche. As this investigation has already been made, I can not see what can be gained by again referring it to the Secretary.

I will not insist upon the amendment No. 54, relating to the Flathead Agency, because it contains matters of legislation; but the other three amendments, while they may appear to most Senators to involve but little, I assure you are each and every one important as regards the welfare of the Indians of my State.

I do not like to delay action on the report. I know we are getting crowded; but as to these three amendments my conscience would not be clear if I did not at this time move to nonconcur in the conference report and ask for further conference.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Montana that he will not accomplish anything by sending the report back now after the action the House has already taken. At least I have never known such an operation to succeed. I am very sure that he had better let the matter go and attempt to secure it in some other way. I think, so far as the salary of the agent on the Flathead Reservation goes, that that can be attended to in another bill. Of course, as to the wandering Indians of Rocky Boy's band it is very important to know where they are to be located. That is left to the judgment of the Secretary. He can locate them where he ses fit.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, there is one class of amendments to which I should like to call the chairman's attention and ask for something of an explanation. I refer especially to amendment No. 57, known as the "amendment to capitalize the fund of the Winnebago tribes of Indians." I think perhaps there may be in the bill other amendments of the same character. This amendment was put in by the Senate. It speaks for itself. It is merely to pay some Indians what we owe them by treaty, and I should like to have the chairman explain, if it will not take too much time, why it is that we can not have retained in the bill an amendment so just in its nature and so necessary. Why are such amendments rejected? What is the reason for it? Are we to go year by year and simply have them turned down on the statement that the conferees could not agree, and therefore the Indian can not get his money? As a matter of fact, it simply means that the United States is repudiating its debts. That is all it means in plain, simple language. I want to know if we have got to continue that course. I presume, of course, the conference committee has done its full duty, but it does seem to me that we ought to know if we are going to have the matter go along here year after year and be put in the position of having the Government repudiate what is not only a just debt, but a debt toward its wards. If the Senator will explain the matter, I shall be very glad to know what the status of the amendment is and what we are to look for in the future.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I can not prognosticate what can be hoped for in the future. I am in favor of capitalizing these funds, and I do not think a dollar is any more this year than it will be next year; but, unfortunately in the exigencies of legislation, we encounter those who do regard a dollar as larger to-day than perhaps it may be a year from now. One difficulty conferees always have to encounter is that a great many of these matters, if they are ever put on the bill have to be put on in the Senate; which leaves a great many amendments for the Senate conferees to defend.

I doubt whether the Senator meant that this amendment involved the payment of a debt. Instead of continuing the payment of interest it simply provides for the capitalizing of what we recognize every year in the payment of the interest. It must be said for our coconferees that where a matter came up—and there were two or three in the bill, I think—involving the honor of the Government in the recognition of a debt, notwithstanding this plea of postponing the capitalization of these funds, such items were very promptly accorded a place on the bill.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not think, Mr. President, that I misstated the facts about the matter.

Mr. CLAPP. What amendment is it?

Mr. BURKETT. It is amendment No. 57. The Senator seems to make a distinction between being willing to pay interest on a debt and paying the debt itself. I have had some debtors in my life that seemed to be willing to pay interest forever, but never pay the principal; and that is the position of the Government in this case. For half a century we have owed these Indians the money by treaty and we have been paying them the interest on it. The Indian has got to a place where he wants his principal, and he is entitled to have that principal. The Government has said by solemn decree that that Indian is a competent Indian; he is a citizen of the United States; he is able to handle his own business, and, as a matter of fact, many of the Winnebago Indinas are handling their own business.

There is one who is, I think, trying a case in the Supreme Court of the United States to-day—an Indian worth an eighth as much as all this fund of the Winnebago Indians, and he himself, by his own endeavors, has made it. I know another one of these Indians who is drawing a salary of $7,000 a year as manager of a manufacturing concern in Philadelphia. Perhaps the Senator says those Indians do not need the money proposed to be appropriated, but they are entitled to it whether they need it or not. For half a century or more the Government has owed the Indians this money.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator will pardon me one question, because, if he states the matter correctly, I certainly do not understand the treaty. I do not understand that to-day we owe this money as a debt that is due. We have agreed to pay the Indians this interest from year to year. Now, as a matter of governmental policy, some of us are in favor of taking up those treaties and, instead of continuing the interest on them, to get the Indians to agree to accept the principal and close the treaty.

Mr. BURKETT. If the Senator will just read the amendment the Senate put in the bill it will show exactly what this proposition is.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Senators are using the term "interest." Is it not a fact that this is an annuity, and that there is no principal behind it?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then there was a principal sum upon which interest was to be paid?

Mr. CLAPP. In this particular case $883,249.58.

Mr. HEYBURN. When was it to become due?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not recall.

Mr. CURTIS. If I may be permitted to interrupt, in the treaty with the Winnebago Indians of 1837 there is the following provision:

Ninth. To invest the balance of the proceeds of the lands ceded in the first article of the treaty, amounting to $1,100,000, and to guarantee to them an interest of not less than 5 per cent.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then there is a large principal, and now you are going to capitalize the interest and discard the principal?

Mr. CLAPP. No; we are going to capitalize the principal and pay it, if we can; but we are unable to get the necessary legislation.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator will allow me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. The point is this: The Indians now have a paper credit; the Government of the United States owes them so much money, on which it pays interest at 5 per cent annually. Now, if this item goes through, instead of having a paper credit, there will be in the Treasury of the United States this amount of money to their credit, upon which we will appropriate no more interest in the annual appropriation bill, but upon which interest will be paid by the Government at 5 per cent until the debt to the Indians is discharged.

Mr. BURKETT. There is another provision, I will say to the Senator——

Mr. CURTIS. Then there is a provision here that upon application of any individual member of this tribe the Secretary of the Interior, if he deems the Indian competent to transact his own business, may pay to him his proportionate share of the tribal funds.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was looking at the amount of this item, to wit, $804,909.17. Is the $800,000 principal or interest?

Mr. CLAPP. It is principal.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is due these Indians?

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; it is not due them as of this particular time. We are simply carrying it for them for an unlimited time. That is why I called the attention of the Senator from Nebraska——

Mr. McLAURIN. It is owing, but not due?

Mr. CLAPP. It is owing, but not due.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to get at the status of this.

Eighth. To set apart the sum of $10,000 to defray contingent and incidental expenses in the execution of this treaty, and the expenses of an exploring party, when the said Indians shall express a willingness to send one to the country southwest of the Missouri river.

Ninth. To invest the balance of the proceeds of the lands ceded in the first article of the treaty, amounting to $1,100,000 and to guarantee to them an interest of not less than 5 per cent.

To invest the proceeds of the land. I do not suppose the Government of the United States invests it in anything. The Government does not invest money on interest. I suppose we owe the eleven hundred thousand dollars, and I suppose the interest has been kept up by the Government. So that this proposition here is to appropriate the sum of $804,909.17 by virtue of the act to which I have just called attention. There seems to be some discrepancy in the amounts.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will turn to the top of this page, he will find that the House item, being the interest on $78,340.41, and over on the other page the interest on $804,909.17, at 5 per cent, were stricken out by the Senate, and in place of them we put in amendment 57, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to place this amount to their credit on the books.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had noticed that.

Mr. CLAPP. There is no discrepancy.

Mr. HEYBURN. The provisions of the House are stricken out and the Senate amendment is substituted. But it seems to me singular that we should quibble about the transfer of this money. The Government owes it. No time is fixed for its payment. But we are paying interest on the principal, and the principal is eleven hundred thousand dollars, and this is something less than $900,000. It occurred to me that there must be some way of accounting for the difference between those two sums.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question. If the Senate should disagree to the conference report, what would be the attitude of the matter then? Would it go back to another conference?

Mr. CLAPP. I do not know. It would depend upon what the House does, I suppose.

Mr. McLAURIN. Is there any probability of the Senate getting what it desires, if it should desire to change the report, by sending the report back to another conference? If not, then I want to say that all this debate as to what we want about it will accomplish nothing if the House will not agree to it.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McLAURIN. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. I do not know what the Senate has done on similar occasions, but I know in the House repeatedly we used to disagree to a conference report and send it back with instructions to the House conferees to insist on House amendment numbered so-and-so; and we as frequently got it as we lost it. I am so convinced that in this case two or three of these items have been merely overlooked——

Mr. CLAPP. I want to assure the Senator that those items were not overlooked. They were carefully gone over, and one of them with the Commissioner present urging the item.

Mr. DIXON. But will the chairman of the committee permit me to ask, How could it have been otherwise than overlooked, when the South Dakota agent is raised from eighteen hundred to twenty-two hundred, with the Flathead agent drawing only fifteen hundred, three hundred less than any other agent in the Northwest in that Department, when the committee's report shows that he has more property and more Indians, outside of the Sioux in South Dakota, than any agent in the service? The miserable pittance of $300 is not added to his salary of $1,500.

Mr. CLAPP. That is very easily explained. The Senate conferees would hardly on their own motion recede from a Senate amendment, and if the House conferees made no objection to a Senate amendment, that amendment would be reported back here as agreed to, as a matter of course, while if the House conferees objected to another amendment and we had to encounter their objection and attempt to overcome it, we of course could only do that by indefinite postponement, and then perhaps not succeed. That accounts for the fact that one amendment may be rejected while another amendment, perhaps no more meritorious, or possibly even less meritorious, remains in the bill. We did not ourselves seek to strike out any of the Senate amendments.

Mr. DIXON. I would not for one moment say that.

Mr. CLAPP. We only yielded on those amendments where the House conferees did object to them. If they made no objection to the South Dakota amendment, very naturally it would remain in the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. What I wish to say is that if there is no probability of a change being made in the report (I take it that the conferees did all they could to sustain the amendments put on the bill by the Senate) it is useless to discuss what we should like to have, because we have to take what results from the conference.

Mr. CLAPP. I suggest that the Senate conferees would not be in position to make a very strenuous fight in behalf of these amendments. Of course, what may be the result I can not foresee. I should regret to see the report go back, because every day I have had to postpone this matter out of courtesy to Senators who wished to speak. It would require a great deal of time.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is true the amount involved in the amendments about which disagreement has occurred in the conference is not in the aggregate large, but I think there is a principle involved in this proceeding which we can not well disregard.

In the first place, it appears amendments have been agreed to which set out this disagreement in bold lines of discrimination. All these amendments were recommended by the Department. Some were adopted, and others more meritorious, of the exact class, rejected. My colleague is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs and seeks but a privilege which I think every Senator should have who is interested in an amendment, before it is disagreed to, if he shall elect to demand the privilege, to wit, to make a statement before the committee of conference. That is not a right.

Mr. TELLER. That is not a right.

Mr. CARTER. I do not assert it as a right, but I say it is a privilege which I think should be accorded to any Senator upon mere request. My colleague insists that these amendments have been regularly recommended; that there is nothing to investigate; that the amendment proposing further investigation as a substitute for the one rejected is but asking the Department to do again that which it has heretofore done, a mere repetition of proceeding. Therefore the substitute is of no virtue at all.

Now, my colleague insists that he be heard upon these amendments before the committee of conference, and I think the chairman will agree with me that that request is entitled to consideration. I believe upon a statement of the facts before the conferees they will agree to one, if not all, of these amendments as to which disagreement has been entered. There is one amendment involving a considerable amount of legislation upon which my colleague does not insist, but as to those not obnoxious to the rule of new legislation, merely involving matters recommended by the Department, I think there should be no question at all, and I believe the Senator in charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee, will agree that the request of my colleague is entirely reasonable and ought to be acceded to.

This session is yet young. We are not in the closing days. The Committee on Indian Affairs has but one great duty to perform in the course of a session, and that is to scrutinize, prepare, and secure the passage of this appropriation bill. There are yet sixty days remaining of the session——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon an interruption? That is true as to the committee, but the members of the committee have some work to do here, and this idea of sitting day after day waiting until the closing hours of each day is the matter I was referring to.

Mr. CARTER. I think this report can be disposed of within an hour if the matter is given a hearing.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I will say to the Senators from Montana that I should have been very glad to have seen these amendments maintained, but I can not allow the statement made by the senior Senator from Montana to go unquestioned that it is a right, or even a custom, of Senators to appear before conference committees.

Mr. CARTER. I used the word "privilege."

Mr. TELLER. It is not a privilege. There are some conference committees which absolutely decline to hear anyone when they get into conference. My experience has been that very rarely indeed is anyone heard before a committee of conference. There may have been exceptions, and I think there have been, but they are very rare.

I am not going to object to the Senator from Montana appearing before the conference, because that is a question I do not have anything to do with. I do not wish to have it established here that anyone has a right to go before a conference committee. That the conference committee must settle for itself.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, just a word in support of what I apprehended was, in the press of business before the conferees, an oversight. Here is $30,000 for the Wandering band of Chippewa Indians. I personally know their condition. The matter was investigated two or three years ago. I know they are starving and hungry, dying by the score every year. It is merely a matter of humanity to purchase land for these one hundred Indians who were West from the reservation when the lands were allotted. How can I on this floor, or my colleague from Montana, consistently agree to this report when we know the bill carries $50,000 for the homeless Indians in California. The bill last year carried $50,000, if I recall it, for the homeless Indians in California. There is $50,000 in this bill——

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator will pardon me. The bill last year carried a hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. DIXON. A hundred thousand dollars, or whatever it was, and $50,000 this year.

Mr. CLAPP. But there was an incompleted plant that had been inaugurated, and the plea was made, and I think it a strong one, that a large amount of the money spent would be lost unless enough was appropriated to complete the plant.

Mr. CURTIS. The land had already been picked out.

Mr. CLAPP. The land had already been picked out and partly bought.

Mr. DIXON. I have on my desk a letter from, written within the last ten days, Chief Rocky Boy, of the Wandering band of Chippewas; and we are to buy the land for him and his children; about one hundred of them. The old man thinks this bill has already passed Congress, because I wrote him that it had passed the Senate, and that the item had gone into the Indian appropriation bill as an amendment, and I apprehended that no question would be raised about it. He said "But for this, I and my children, some of them, would be dead before snow flies this fall."

It is an emergency case, and I do believe, if the conferees had at least accorded some one the privilege of merely explaining the condition, there would have been no question by any gentleman either of the House or of the Senate as to amendment 53 remaining in the bill. I think it no more than right.

Mr. CLAPP. In view of the possible result of a call of the Senate, I will ask to have the matter passed over for the day.

Mr. DIXON. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that, without comparing proceedings in the House and in the Senate—and I confess I know very little about the method of procedure here—I know in the House many times we have instructed the conferees as to matters in conference. Would it be anything out of the ordinary at this time for the Senate to insist upon the amendment and let us have one more conference with the House conferees and see if this amendment can not remain in the bill? It would take but a few minutes to do it.

I assure the Senators present that, than item No. 53, no more important provision for a band of a hundred homeless, illiterate people has been before the Senate in the Sixtieth Congress.

Mr. CLAPP. I did not want to cut off the matter by that suggestion, but I simply made it as a safeguard against any tendency of that kind. I have said all I care to say. It is for the Senate to determine. Occasionally conference reports are sent back for further conference.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, some days ago, upon the report of Senate bill 1036——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi rise to the pending report?

Mr. McLAURIN. I understood it had gone over.

Mr. CLAPP. No; I withdraw that suggestion.

Mr. McLAURIN. I did not observe that it had been withdrawn. I thought the matter had gone over until morning.

Mr. CLAPP. I suppose the parliamentary situation would require a vote on the report.

Mr. LODGE. Let the report go over.

Mr. CLAPP. That would not in the meantime make it the subject of further conference, which Senators desire.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no. There has to be a vote to disagree to make it the subject of further conference. All the Senator has to do is to withdraw the report and let it go over until to-morrow, when there will be a full attendance of the Senate, and he can then dispose of it.

Mr. CLAPP. It might be disagreed to under present conditions.

Mr. LODGE. That is a different proposition. I did not understand that the Senator proposed that the Senate should disagree.

Mr. CLAPP. No; I do not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee on conference.

Mr. DIXON. Is there any reason why we should not pro forma disagree to the report and then bring it up to-morrow.

Mr. CARTER. I will say to my colleague that I think the matter can be disposed of now and a disagreement reached. I believe it is the present temper of the Senate to disagree to the report if the question is put.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, and request a further conference with the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Vice-President.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. CLAPP, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. OWEN.

PATENTS FOR CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, some days ago I asked for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1036) for the relief of locators of military bounty land warrants and surveyor-general's certificates, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] asked that it go over until the printing of the report. I understand that Senator now has no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TELLER. I have not any objection.

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment to strike out all of the bill and insert:

Be it enacted, etc., That all patents heretofore issued on applications made for title to public lands between June 5, 1901, and June 20, 1907, with either military bounty land warrants, agricultural college land scrip, or surveyor-general's certificates, be, and the same are hereby, declared valid; and that all such locations, where the applications to locate were made between June 5, 1901, and June 20, 1907, with either military bounty land warrants, agricultural college land scrip, or surveyor-general's certificates, and upon which patents have not been issued, are hereby declared legal, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office is hereby authorized and directed to issue patents on all such locations: Provided, That they are otherwise in accordance with the rules and regulations in such cases made and provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Public Lands reported an amendment to strike out the preamble and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whereas by the act of Congress of March 2, 1889 (25 Stats., p. 854), the lands of the United States, except in the State of Missouri, were withdrawn from sale by private entry; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior, on June 5, 1901 (Victor H. Provensal, 30 Land Dec., p. 616), and February 5, 1902 (Charles P. Maginnis, 31 Land Dec., p. 222), promulgated decisions authorizing the location of surveyor-general's certificates, agricultural college land scrip, and military bounty land warrants upon lands that had theretofore been offered at private sale, and therefore were subject to location with such certificates and warrants, notwithstanding the said act of March 2, 1889; and

Whereas the honorable Secretary of the Interior, on June 20, 1907 (Lawrence W. Simpson, 35 Land Dec., pp. 399 to 609), reversed the two decisions of his Department thus previously promulgated by it and rendered a new decision in which he stated "That there can be no property rights acquired in defiance of law. The only power of the Land Department to dispose of public lands * * * is by act of Congress. When it develops that a departmental construction is erroneous, the improper construction can not be further allowed and the will of Congress further overborne by the Executive;" and

Whereas on the 21st day of December, 1907, in the Roy McDonald land warrant test case, the ruling in said Simpson case was further modified so as to authorize the patenting of all entries and locations made with and under the warrants and scrip above described, the said opinion concluding as follows:

"In the light of the decisions above quoted I am fully impressed that my plain duty under the circumstances presented requires that recognition be given to all locations completed under the faith of, and in the light of, the holding of this Department, where the lands located had not been at the time of said locations reserved or appropriated to any particular purpose, and in which no question as to the right under the location is raised, except that the land located is without the limits of the State of Missouri. There should be included within this protection those who, prior to the decision of June 20, 1907, entered or located lands under the paragraph in the original Simpson decision, hereinbefore quoted, and you will give such orders or directions as will carry into effect the conclusions herein reached;" and

Whereas by reason of said respective decisions of the Interior Department many locations have been made and patents issued upon the faith of the rulings in the Provensal and Maginnis cases, and substantial rights and equities have accrued to the patentees and entrymen, which have been recognized and upheld by the latest ruling in the McDonald case supra; and

Whereas by reason of the diversity and conflict of the various rulings above recited, it is equitable and proper that the titles acquired under the decisions above referred to should be quieted and confirmed as against any future change in decision, or collateral attack: Now, therefore,

Mr. KEAN. I should like to ask why any preamble is necessary?

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not see any necessity for a preamble, but I do not see that it can do any harm.

Mr. KEAN. It seems to me to be most of the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. Yes; it was most of the original bill, and a new preamble was put in by the Committee on Public Lands. As I said, I do not see any necessity for the preamble, but I can not see that it can do any harm.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that the preamble be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was rejected.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of patentees and locators of military bounty land warrants, agricultural college land scrip, and surveyor-general's certificates."

CLAIMS OF ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH IN PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 16143) to provide for payment of the claims of the Roman Catholic Church in the Philippine Islands.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $403,030.19, to be paid to the Archbishop of Manila, in the Philippine Islands, as the representative (and trustee) of the Roman Catholic Church in the islands; and the acceptance of this sum to be in full satisfaction of all claims for use and occupation of the property of that church in the islands and for damages done thereto by the military forces of the United States prior to January 15, 1906.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LETTERS PATENT.

Mr. SMOOT. I am directed by the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15841) to amend section 4896 of the Revised Statutes, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I ask that it be substituted for the bill (S. 3971) to amend section 4896 of the Revised Statutes, being Order of Business 321 on the Calendar.

The committee amendment is in conformity with the wishes of the Senate in regard to a similar bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate bill 3971 will be indefinitely postponed and the House bill just reported will take the place of the Senate bill on the Calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the present consideration of the House bill just reported by me. As I stated, the amendment conforms to the wishes of the Senate in a similar case.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. KEAN. Do I understand that this is a substitute bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is exactly the same bill as the House bill with the exception of striking out the objectionable part to which the Senate objected the other day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 4896 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, amended so that the section shall read as follows:

"SEC. 4896. When any person, having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted, dies before the patent is granted the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve on his executor or administrator, in trust for the heirs at law of the deceased, in case he shall have died intestate; or if he shall have left a will disposing of the same, then in trust for his devisees in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him in his lifetime; and when any person having made any new invention or discovery for which a patent might have been granted becomes insane before a patent is granted the right of applying for and obtaining the patent shall devolve on his legally appointed guardian, conservator, or representative in trust for his estate in as full manner and on the same terms and conditions as the same might have been claimed or enjoyed by him while sane; and when the application is made by such legal representative the oath or affirmation required to be made shall be so varied in form that it can be made by them. The executor or administrator duly authorized under the law of any foreign country to administer upon the estate of the deceased inventor shall, in case the said inventor was not domiciled in the United States at the time of his death, have the right to apply for and obtain the patent. The authority of such foreign executor or administrator shall be proved by certificate of a diplomatic or consular officer of the United States.

"The foregoing section, as to insane persons, is to cover all applications now on file in the Patent Office or which may be hereafter made."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of joint resolution (S. R. 68) providing for additional lands for Idaho under the provisions of the Carey Act.

The Secretary read the joint resolution and, there being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to make available an additional 1,000,000 acres of arid lands within the State of Idaho, to be subject to the terms of the act of August 18, 1894, commonly known as the "Carey Act" as amended by the act of June 11, 1896, and the act approved March 3, 1901, and allows the State of Idaho, under the provisions of these acts, this additional area, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purposes and under the provisions of these acts.

Mr. McLAURIN. I should like to have the Senator from Idaho explain the purposes of the joint resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. The joint resolution was unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Lands. I have here a telegram from the governor of Idaho, which, perhaps, will explain it as quickly as could be done in any other way. The telegram reads:

BOISE, IDAHO, March 14, 1908.

Hon. W. B. HEYBURN, Washington, D. C.

Map was filed and request made yesterday for segregation of 800,000 acres of Carey Act land in Owyhee County. This land is all unsurveyed. It is important that your bill providing for survey of all unsurveyed lands in Idaho should become law. Survey of lands in Snake River Valley should be given immediate attention or development and settlement will be greatly retarded.

F. R. GOODING.

I can make the measure plain in a moment. It does not grant anything to the State, except as a medium for the settlement of the land. The Carey Act is the name given to an act of Congress which provided that upon water being brought upon land, on an arrangement satisfactory to the State, the Government would deed the land to the State, to be disposed of to actual settlers only, in tracts not to exceed 160 acres to each settler. The Carey Act has been one of the best land acts ever passed, and I do not except the homestead act. In our State we have already settled up more than a million acres of land under the Carey Act. The other day the Senate granted us another million. That makes the second million. It is all practically ready to be taken up now. This is an application for the third million acres, and there are the business enterprise and the money behind this third million to settle it up. The Government of the United States is interested in the settlement of the land.

Mr. TELLER. It is more hopeful than the Reclamation Service.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it is the best land act ever passed. It means actual settlement and speedy settlement.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say that this is the second million during the present session?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Unless I am mistaken, it was not passed at the last Wednesday meeting of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HEYBURN. It was the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Lands, and it was thoroughly considered. I made quite a lengthy statement as to the conditions and circumstances before the Committee on Public Lands, and the joint resolution was unanimously reported.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I am mistaken, if that is the case. I understood that the question on the second million acres was under discussion before the Committee on Public Lands, but was not finally decided. But I may be mistaken as to that.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator is mistaken. Of course I should not have reported it unless I was instructed to do so. The report came up to me from the clerk of the committee in the usual way, and it was reported.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3530) to provide for the erection of a public building at Oklahoma City, Okla.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in section 1, page 1, line 11, after the word "dollars," to strike out "For the purpose aforesaid the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed on the site heretofore acquired for that purpose a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, court, and other offices of the Government at Oklahoma City, Okla., the cost of said building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, not to exceed $500,000.

SEC. 2. That said Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, any additional grounds for the site of said building which, in his judgment, may be necessary and desirable.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FREMONT, NEBR.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1072) to authorize the extension and enlargement of the post-office building at Fremont, Nebr.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in section 1, page 1, line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty," so as to make the section read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the post-office building in the city of Fremont, Nebr., to be extended and enlarged at a total cost to the United States of not to exceed $50,000, including all necessary changes in, additions thereto, alterations of, and repairs to the present building, and of the heating and plumbing systems therein, and drainage and approaches thereto, which may be incident to such extension and enlargement of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SURVEY OF GALVESTON HARBOR, TEXAS.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 46.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made an examination and survey of Galveston Harbor, as a whole, including Galveston Harbor, Galveston channel, Texas City channel, and Port Bolivar channel, in the State of Texas, for the purpose of establishing a broad, comprehensive, and systematic plan for the future extension, enlargement, and deepening of said harbor, so as to meet the growing needs of commerce, and to estimate the probable cost thereof.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, March 17, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 16, 1908.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, March 14, was read and approved.

RESTORATION OF MOTTO TO COINS.

Mr. MCKINLEY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill H. R. 17296, and that twenty minutes of debate be allowed on each side, and the previous question called at the end of forty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 17296, that there shall be twenty minutes of debate on a side, and that the previous question shall be considered as ordered to the final passage of the bill. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the motto "In God we trust," heretofore inscribed on certain denominations of the gold and silver coins of the United States of America, shall hereafter be inscribed upon all such gold and silver coins of said denominations as heretofore.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect thirty days after its approval by the President.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the time be allowed to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY] on this side and to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] on the other side, and that the request also include that the bill shall not be subject to be recommitted as would be the case in a motion to suspend.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKINLEY] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] to twenty minutes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general leave to print on this bill for five legislative days be granted to all Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] asks unanimous consent that general leave to print shall be granted upon this bill for five legislative days.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that if the debate is confined to this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is my motion—confined to this subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN].

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in advocacy of the adoption of the committee's report recommending the passage of the bill providing for the restoration of the motto "In God we trust" to the coins of the United States. I congratulate the country and the committee upon the fact that this report comes to this House from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures by the vote of every Republican and Democrat of that committee. Immediately upon the assembling of the committee, after its appointment, I gave notice that I would press for legislation accomplishing this result. A subcommittee was appointed, consisting of Representatives PEARRE, WOOD, and myself. The subcommittee considered all of the various bills which were introduced, all aiming at the same object, and differing only in some minor details. The report of the subcommittee was unanimous for the restoration of the motto, and, as previously stated, so was the action of the full committee in adopting the report of the subcommittee. It is fair to state that from the very beginning of the consideration of the subject to the final conclusion of the committee there was never any difference of opinion. This action upon the part of the committee furnishes a lesson to the country and the world to the effect that this is a Christian nation, and that this body is composed of patriotic Americans who, regardless of party affiliations, fearlessly discharge a public duty when they are once convinced there is a duty to be discharged.

The President of the United States, in my judgment, acted not only unwisely in ordering that this motto be stricken from the coins but, I think, acted in violation of the spirit of the law as it was written; but be it said to his credit that he has in no way interfered with the action of the committee in the consideration of this question, but has left them free to exercise their own judgment in the discharge of their duty as they saw it.

I believe that the world already understands that we are a Christian, God-fearing, God-loving people, and it was not necessary to emphasize this fact by the statute which originally allowed this motto to be placed upon our coins. But it was done at a time when civil war was upon us; when the hand of brother was turned against brother; when the minds of men were enraged, and the settlement of problems was submitted to the arbitrament of arms, the result of which no man could at that time foretell. The battle of Manassas had been fought; the pride of the nation in its various sections had been aroused; the North and the South were arrayed against each other in bloody warfare; the stars and bars were floating over one section of the country, while the Stars and Stripes waved in another. The blood of America was boiling; cruel war had possession of the land.

It was at this time, viz, November, 1861, that a Pennsylvania minister advised the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Salmon P. Chase, "that this nation might perish and that there should be some evidence of the religious faith of its inhabitants preserved upon its coins." Adopting the suggestion of this divine, in April, 1864, in March, 1865, and in February, 1873, Congress enacted laws providing, in substance, that the words "In God we trust" might, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be inscribed upon such coins as would admit of the motto.

We can not claim any unique distinction for having pointed, by the use of a motto, to the faith of our fathers. We were not the first nation to adopt a motto emphasizing its religious faith or belief, for with the establishment of Christianity as the Roman religion in A. D. 312, we are told that Constantine, in his march against Maxentius, claimed to have seen on October 12, A. D. 312, a vision of the cross in the sky. In order to perpetuate this vision he caused to be placed upon his coins the labarum, which was his military standard, the labarum representing the cross which was the monogram of Christ. Long before the establishment of Christianity as the Roman religion the pagan types had been for years reproduced upon the coins.

The Byzantine coins bore a cross, and afterwards other Christian designs were employed, among them Christ or the Virgin Mary, the latter being represented as upholding the walls of Constantinople.

History also records the fact that in 143 B. C. the Hebrews had a silver coin showing thereon a cup or chalice, meaning "A pot of manna." A year or so afterwards they issued a coin bearing a triple lily or hyacinth, which is supposed to have signified "Aaron's rod." There were also coins bearing the words "Jerusalem the Holy," which name came from the decree of Dentrius Soter, King of Syria, when he decreed in 162 B. C. that the city should be "holy and free." In the Gospel of Matthew it is called the Holy City, and we are told that the Arabs to this day call it by the name "El Kuds," meaning "The Holy."

A few years thereafter the Jews used upon their coins such reverential mottoes as "The redemption of Zion," "Eleazar, the High Priest," "First Year of the Redemption of Israel," "The Deliverence of Jerusalem," the series of ancient Jewish coins ending with the copper money struck at Jerusalem by the conquering Arabs. The latter issued coins at Jerusalem, bearing such inscription as "Mohammed, Apostle of God," and "Palestine." These are probably the first coins ever made that bore the sacred word "God" inscribed thereon.

The first silver groats of England were coined during the reign of Edward I, in 1273–1307, bearing the inscription, "Edward, by the grace of God," etc.

In 1344, Edward III of England caused to be coined the Florin, which bore in Latin the inscription "He shall be exalted in glory," and also the words "By the grace of God," etc. His son, the Black Prince, the Prince of Aquitane, issued a coin on which was the inscription "God the Just, Powerful, and Patient Judge."

James I of England issued the sovereign with this inscription in Latin: "Let God arise, let his enemies be scattered."

The unhappy Mary Stuart used upon her coin the motto, "By the grace of God." Upon her marriage with Henry, Lord Darnley, 1565, which step had been violently opposed by her ministers, Mary had struck a coin which bore in Latin, the following legend: "Whom God has united, no one shall separate." Darnley was afterwards murdered.

The virgin Queen, Elizabeth, used this motto upon her coins: "Elizabeth, by the grace of God, the rose without a thorn."

James VI of Scotland, in 1567 and 1625, inscribed upon his coins the motto: "Save thy people, oh Lord."

George III had the motto inscribed upon his coins: "By the grace of God," etc. Queen Victoria had placed upon her coins the mottoes: "God guides my steps," and also "Victoria, by the grace of God," etc.

In 1670 Louis XIV, King of France, ordered the coinage of a large sum of money, on which coins was inscribed: "Louis XIV, by the grace of God King of France and Navarre, King."

Upon the coins of Portugal, as early as 1750, there was raised upon the same a cross, beneath which was the inscription "In hoc signo vinces."

As early as 1732 there appeared upon the coins of Russia the motto: "By the grace of God," etc.

The coins of Switzerland bore reverential mottoes as early as 1741.

In 1773 the coins of Bavaria bore reverential mottoes such as "By the grace of God," etc., and so it was with the 10-thaler piece of George IV of Hanover and of Charles William of Brunswick in 1805. On the coins of 1734, issued by the Duke of Brunswick and Luneburg, we find the same inscription.

Prussia, as far back as 1701, had inscribed upon its coins the motto, "By the grace of God," etc., and the coins issued by the Duke of Saxony in 1784 also bore an inscription with the same words.

In 1621 Johann, George II of Wettin and Saxony, put upon his coins the words "God and Fatherland." In 1686 his successor used upon his coins the motto: "By the grace of God," etc. One hundred years later, in 1790, we find Frederick Augustus III of Saxony using the same inscription upon his coins. In 1751 Wurttemburg had gold coins bearing the legend "With God and Time."

Upon the coins of Austria there were the words "By the Grace of God Emperor of Austria," etc. The Brabant sovereign of 1783 was inscribed "Charles VI by the grace of God," and so forth.

The double ducat of Hungary, issued in 1765, bore the inscription, "Maria Theresia by the grace of God," etc. On the ducat of Kremnitz of 1835 we find "Saint Maria, Mother of God, Patron of Hungaria."

From 1786 to 1792 the French coins bore the words, "By the Grace of God," etc. On a French silver coin of 1690 we find the same inscription, and also the words, "Christ reigns, conquers, governs." In the time of Louis XIV we find "Blessed be the name of the Lord" and "Oh Lord save the King" upon the coins of France. One of the French coins of 1643 was inscribed "Sit nomen Domini benedictum."

In 1789 the word "God" appeared upon the coins of Mogul Shah Allam, one of the princes of India.

After the Belgian revolution in 1790 Belgium issued a gold coin with the words, "Domini est Regnum," meaning "The Kingdom is the Lord's." In 1835 Belgium had a coin which bore the inscription, "God Protects Belgium."

In 1734 we find "By the grace of God," etc., upon the coins of Charles, King of Naples, and also upon those of Charles, King of Sicily, in 1738. On the coins of Italy in 1805–1814 appeared the words, "God Protects Italy."

Denmark, as far back as 1694, in the reign of Christian V, had the words, "By the grace of God," etc., inscribed upon the national coins. Christian VIII issued a coin in 1813 with the same inscription.

In 1824 and 1832 Brazil had coins which showed thereon a cross with the words, "In hoc signo vinces." A gold coin of Brazil of 1824 bore the words, "By the grace of God," etc.

It will be seen from the above that the Western Hemisphere had almost from the beginning of time represented upon its coins its faith in the Supreme Ruler of the Universe. The coins of this country do not seem, however, to have been a medium of giving expression to religious belief. The first appearance of any evidence of religious faith upon the coins in America seems to have been in 1682, when the colony of New Jersey adopted the coins of Mark Newby, which he had brought over from Dublin. On these coins was represented St. Patrick, the patron saint of the Emerald Isle, with the trefoil in his right hand and a crozier in his left hand, with the motto "Ecce Grex." Another one of these coins showed St. Patrick, his right hand outstretched, banishing serpents and reptiles, which are shown on the ground with the legend "Quiescat plebs."

During the reign of William and Mary there appeared the Carolina cent, which bore the inscription "God preserve Carolina and the Lords proprietors, 1694."

The New England token of the same year had thereon the words "God preserve New England."

In 1721–22 and 1767 the Louisiana cent was coined, bearing the inscription "Sit nomen Domini benedictum."

In my own State the Virginia half-penny of 1774 bore in Latin the inscription "George III, by the grace of God." From this time, covering a period of nearly one hundred years, during which period the independence of the colonies had been achieved, and, although religious freedom and human liberty had been established in what was destined to be the greatest nation of the earth, there does not seem to have appeared upon any of the money issued within this country any reference to a Supreme Being or to the fact that we are a Christian nation. It remained for Mormon Utah to make the first reference upon a coin to the existence of an Omnipotent Being. This was done in 1849, when Utah issued gold pieces in the denominations of $2.50, $5, $10, and $20, bearing the inscription "Holiness to the Lord." It was fifteen years thereafter, viz, in 1864, under the conditions which I have referred to, that the United States Government had inscribed upon its issue of 2-cent bronze pieces the motto "In God we trust."

In 1866 it was placed on the five, ten, and twenty dollar gold pieces, and on the 25-cent, 50-cent, and one-dollar silver pieces, and 5-cent nickel pieces. In 1873 it was placed on the trade dollar. It continued to be inscribed upon most of our coins until, by the recent order of President Roosevelt, it was stricken therefrom, and we come now, to-day, asking, by the passage of the bill under consideration, that this motto be restored. The demand for its restoration comes from every section of our land. In every Christian heart there beats the hope that you will by your action determine that the circulating coin of this country shall carry the knowledge that we are a Christian people; that we believe that, however strong men may grow, however powerful nations may become, there is a just, merciful, and eternal God, in whom the civilized world can faithfully and implicitly put its trust.

Mr. Chairman, we are a united people; civil war and strife are forever banished from our land; eternal peace on earth and good will toward men is the hope of every patriotic citizen. This is and will be as long as we are firm and steadfast in the teachings of the God of Israel, and I entertain the hope and belief that before the world has seen another century, Christian thought and Christian ideas will control the hearts and minds of all men and upon the wall of every home throughout the universe there will hang, for the enlightenment and encouragement of all who may follow, the sacred motto, "In God we trust." [Loud applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES.] [Loud applause.]

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. Mr. Speaker, the country is to be congratulated that our trust is again to be restored in God. The President of the United States made a great mistake in the judgment of the Christian people of this Republic, when, by order, he directed that the motto "In God we trust" should be removed from our coins. This country is not only a Christian nation, but we are engaged in sending to foreign countries and to distant people our missionaries to preach the religions of Jesus Christ, and we want our money so that when this gold that you say is so good goes across the ocean and is held in the hands of those who do not know of the existence of the Saviour of the world, we can say: "Here are the dollars of the greatest nation on earth, one that does not put its trust in floating navies or in marching armies, but places its trust in God." [Loud applause.]

It was said that there was fun made of this motto; that some men would take a dollar up and make fun of it because it had upon it "In God we trust." Two thousand years ago the Bible said there would be such men, because "The fool hath said in his heart 'there is no God.'" [Applause.] But that argument carried to the ultimatum, that evidences of Christianity must be removed because some people would make fun of them, would tear down every church in the land and pull up every altar in this Republic. [Applause.] I say that I congratulate the committee. It is not a political question, thank God, for us to admit that our trust as well as our treasure should be in Heaven.

I had the pleasure of introducing the first bill to restore this motto which has so long adorned our money. And I most heartily congratulate the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures that they report unanimously in favor of restoring this motto. Mr. Speaker, the Christian legions of this nation will hail with delight favorable action upon this bill. "In God we trust" speaks the language of the fathers. Belief in a Supreme Being is breathed in the Declaration of Independence, lives in the Constitution, hallows the oath we take at the bar of this House. It inspired our soldiers to fight at Bunker Hill, to suffer at Valley Forge, to triumph at Yorktown. Mr. Speaker, this trust in God is the one trust in this land in which the poor are stockholders. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, let us vote this motto back and we shall not have to rewrite the Star Spangled Banner. For we again can say with Francis Scott Key:

Then conquer we must,
Since our cause it is just,
And this be our motto—
"In God is our trust."
And the Star Spangled Banner
Forever shall wave
O'er the land of the free
And the home of the brave.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. McKINLEY of Illinois. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN].

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Mr. Speaker, I am against replacing the motto "In God we trust" on our coins, because I do not believe in any religion that in order to thrive needs advertising, nor do I believe in any person that always hangs out his shingle "I am a Christian."

My dear mother was very religious, and planted true religious principles into the hearts of her children; also taught us to always confide in God. But at the same time she warned us against those who always have religion on their tongue, very frequently expecting to gain some advantage thereby. Thus I have no love for the man who has always one eye turned skyward while the other one is seeking his neighbor's pocketbook. [Laughter.]

I despise the hypocrite, the policy man, the man who has no conviction of his own and is always afraid to tread on somebody's toes. I fully indorse every word contained in that beautiful prayer, lately offered by our worthy Chaplain:

Good Lord, deliver us, we beseech Thee, from the jingo, the demagogue, the bigot, and all other undesirable citizens, and give us instead the patriot, the statesman, the broad-minded, generous-hearted, manly man.

The good book does not seem to favor the advertising of one's religion. Let me read you the following Scriptural text:

Seventh Matthew, twenty-first verse:
"Not everyone that saith unto me, 'Lord, Lord,' shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven."

And again:

Sixth Matthew, fifth and sixth verses:
"And when thou prayest thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are; for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners of the street that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, they shall have their reward.
"But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly."

Those who have coins in their pockets bearing the inscription thereon "In God we trust," and then by their dealings show that they trust more in the almighty dollar and rely upon their shrewdness to get it from others, honestly if they can, "but get it anyway," as the Quaker said to his son, are not true Christians.

Now, if the advocates in favor of this motto on our coins of higher denomination actually believe that it will improve our people and make better Christians of them, then, to be consistent, let us also put "In God we trust" on our 1, 5, and 10 cent pieces, so as to extend the helpful influence of Christianity to the poor newsboy, the bootblack, and to all of those who are not as fortunate as those who possess the larger coins. [Laughter and applause.] And we might also put on the bills of large denomination, particularly the thousand-dollar bills, "Honesty is the best policy."

I fully indorse every single word our highly esteemed President has uttered in defending his action in this matter.

His religious tendencies have never been questioned, and as to his character the following beautiful lines of Pope seem to me very applicable:

Statesman—yet friend to truth! Of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honor clear;
Who broke no promise, served no private end,
Ennobled by himself, by all approv'd.

[Applause.]

The President says:

My own feeling in the matter is due to my very firm conviction that to put such a motto on coins or to use it in any kindred manner not only does no good, but does positive harm, and is in effect irreverence, which comes dangerously close to sacrilege.
A beautiful and solemn sentence such as the one in question should be treated and uttered only with that fine reverence which necessarily implies a certain exaltation of spirit.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. You may.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has not the President said that he would not resent the restoration of the motto?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Not to me, sir. [Great laughter.]

Mr. SHEPPARD. The President has stated that he would not object to the restoration of the motto.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. Why, with the greatest pleasure. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is one of my dearest friends.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, being quick on the trigger, answered that the President did not say so to him; but if the gentleman will accept my word for it, the President has said that if this House passed this bill restoring the motto on the coins he will not veto that bill, believing as he does that the wholesome, moral, religious sentiment of the country is behind it.

Mr. KÜSTERMANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can best be answered by the closing words of the President on this subject:

He says:

If Congress alters the law and directs me to replace on the coins the sentence in question, the direction will be immediately put into effect; but I very earnestly trust that the religious sentiment of the country, the spirit of reverence in the country will prevent any such action being taken.

Mr. Speaker, we can all afford to stand up and be counted in favor of such true religious sentiment. Instead of having that motto on the coins, let the people show through their acts that deeply embedded in their hearts can be found that beautiful motto "In God we trust." [Great applause.]

Mr. McKINLEY of Illinois. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, understanding that there was to be no discussion on this report, but having presented earlier in the session a bill to restore the motto to the coin, I submitted a few remarks on Friday last bearing upon this subject. In view of what has transpired this morning and the opportunity offered me by the chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to say a few words, I desire, particularly as bearing upon what has been said by my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN], to say that the President of the United States is a religious, God-fearing man, and that there was no intent on his part to shock the moral sentiment of the community in the order which removed the motto from the coin. Further than that, if, in the wisdom of this House, the motto shall be ordered back upon the coin, I feel entirely warranted in saying that the President will accept the dictum of this House and will not veto the bill.

I listened with interest to the remarks of my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN]. He trenches upon the ground that the average man in politics hesitates to enter. I did not introduce my bill for the purpose of currying favor with any religious sect, but because in my community there was a desire that it should be made known to the world generally that in this country we do trust in God. Since that bill was introduced and others have been introduced by gentlemen from various sections of the country regardless of politics, I have been impressed with the comments that have followed the discussion of the question. Men have been emboldened to write in defiance of all religious sentiment. They have hailed the removal of the motto as a revolt against the wholesome teachings of the ages. This we should not tolerate.

In the remarks submitted by me on Friday, I quoted from a newspaper editorial that takes a startling view of this question. Listen as I read this unsavory extract, seeking to make capital of the order of the President:

Those who do not believe in God in this country look upon his removal of that unconstitutional, untruthful, and unwarranted deific motto from our coinage as one of the most sensible acts ever performed by the President. They do not trust in God, they know that nobody else does who is sane, and, therefore, they do not see why every coin issuing from our mints should carry forth to the world an unofficial lie.

I am making no pretense in supporting this measure. I have my own views upon public questions; but when such a challenge is put forth, a challenge that enters into every home and fireside, which confronts you and me as we go into our closet in secret to perform that one act of humility which makes worth in man, then I feel it is time to rise and declare, even by law, that this is a God-fearing nation, and that Congress can do no harm in making that declaration emphatic.

Mr. Speaker, there is one thing in the lives of most of us in this House that is impressive. As we enter upon the important duties devolving upon us here as the representatives of the people, and listen to the words uttered by the blind Chaplain each morning, I question whether we do not feel better during the whole of the day for even that brief testimony of our dependence upon the Higher Power. If it is good for us to so humble ourselves as we enter upon the duties of the day, what harm can we possibly do by acknowledging to the world that God has a place in our institutions? It can hurt none; it will console and comfort many. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, I have but little to add to what I have said on a former occasion on this subject. I desire merely to call attention to the fact that almost every infidel in the country has openly rejoiced over the removal of this motto. Frequently Congress has been flooded with circulars from infidel societies, protesting against the restoration of this legend. It was recommended for the coins during the Administration of Abraham Lincoln, doubtless with his knowledge and approval. The fact that the infidels openly object to their restoration, the fact that their removal would be used as an argument to destroy reverence rather than to inculcate it, ought to prompt Congress unanimously to restore the words, "In God we trust." [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to express my approval of the work of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures in unanimously reporting the following bill:

[H. R. 17296, 60th Congress, 1st session.]

Report No. 1106. In the House of Representatives, February 17, 1908. Mr. MCKINLEY of Illinois, introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed. February 26, 1908. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

A bill providing for the restoration of the motto "In God we trust" on certain denominations of the gold and silver coins of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the motto "In God we trust," heretofore inscribed on certain denominations of the gold and silver coins of the United States of America, shall hereafter be inscribed upon all such gold and silver coins of said denominations as heretofore.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect thirty days after its approval by the President.

The committee in this instance is to be congratulated upon its good work; and the whole country is to be congratulated upon the fact that the motto, "In God we trust," which was recently removed from certain of our gold coins, is so soon to be restored. I am glad that this motto, which has graced our coins for so long, is again to have its place upon the nation's money, for I am confident that this bill will pass the House by an almost unanimous vote. [Applause.]

This is no party measure. We may differ among ourselves upon party issues; there may be division of opinion among us as to great governmental questions; but there is no division here to-day upon this bill. We are united as one party, all favoring the return of this lofty sentiment to our coins. [Applause.]

The President made a great mistake in ordering the words stricken from our money. I do not charge, as some do, that the President is an infidel. Such charges are wrong and without foundation. I simply say that our President erred, as all men are likely to do. He has seen his mistake and like a fearless and courageous man, he has virtually admitted his mistake, and says if this bill is passed, he will not veto it. I think the President is a God-fearing man. I think in this matter he made a mistake and is now willing to help undo what he has done.

This is no sectarian question. The Methodist, the Baptist, the Presbyterian, the Catholic, the Hebrews, the Episcopal, in fact all churches, all creeds, who have a belief in God, are as one in the opinion that it was a great mistake to ever have removed this motto from our coins, and they are one in the sentiment that this motto shall be restored. [Applause.]

When it was announced, through the newspapers a few months ago, that this motto had been left off of our coins, I wrote an article criticising it that appeared in many of the papers of my State. I spoke my honest convictions then, and I speak them now. I am not ashamed to proclaim my faith in God. We need God-fearing men in all public positions. A man who is not sound in his belief in God has no right in high office, which is the gift of a God-fearing people. We represent God-fearing people, and we, their representatives, should be God-fearing representatives.

There has gone up a demand from the people of this great country that this mistake of our President shall be corrected, and these simple words with lofty meaning and sentiment shall be restored to our coins.

There is no reason why the late Augustus St. Gaudens should have stricken this striking sentence, so expressive of American reverence and faith, from the gold coins designed by him, and it is regrettable, indeed, that the President of this great God-fearing nation should have permitted it. There is, on the contrary, every reason why it should not have been stricken from our money. There is certainly no harm in having the motto on our money. It is a sentiment that the people love. It is a declaration not only to our people at home, but to all peoples, and to all nations, all over the world, that ours is a nation with a firm and steadfast faith in God. [Applause.]

That infidels all over the country openly rejoiced in the fact that the word "God" was stricken from our money is now a well-known fact. Certain societies, known to be infidelic, have been protesting by mail to Congressmen and Senators against the restoration of this sentence. The removal of this sentence from our coin did not depreciate its monetary value, but it depreciated its sentimental value. The removal of these words was a victory for infidelity. The restoration of them to our coin will be a blow to infidelity and a victory for the God-fearing people of this great nation. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it will not be amiss for me to refer briefly to the circumstances under which the motto was first inscribed upon our coinage. In November, 1861, when one great section of this country was bitterly arrayed against another in war, a minister of Pennsylvania suggested to the Secretary of the Treasury that if the nation should perish no evidence of the religious faith of its inhabitants would be preserved upon its coins. This impressed the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Salmon P. Chase, and believing that no nation is strong, except in the strength of God, or safe except in His defense, and that the trust of the American people in God should be declared on the national coin, he requested the Director of the Mint to prepare a device with a motto, tersely expressing, in the fewest words possible, this national recognition. Legislation was necessary, as the mottoes and devices of our coins had been prescribed by the act of January, 1837, so in April, 1864, March, 1865, and February, 1873, Congress enacted laws providing in substance that "In God we trust" might be inscribed upon such coins as would admit of it. The motto thus had its origin and thus came to us upon our coins.

Thus the sentiment was born when we were a divided people. To-day, thank God! we are a reunited people forever. We are but one people, with but one country and one God, with an undying patriotism for our country and a steadfast faith in God. The American people are glad to honor themselves and their country by having God's name upon their coins. "We are fundamentally a religious people. We are distinguished by our devotion to religious and civil freedom." I dare say that every form of religious thought is represented in America, and yet we are one in the recognition of a supreme and all-wise God.

Early in January of this year I listened to an eloquent and impressive speech delivered by my friend from Texas. He so beautifully and ably said then just what I feel now and what I would like to say, had I the gift and ability to put it as he did; I am therefore going to quote from his words.

The opportunity to worship the omnipotent Father according to the conscience of the individual is the basis of American history, the corner stone of the American Commonwealth. There is an essential relation between God and freedom. Liberty as a permanent prerogative of the people was for all practical purposes an impossible conception before Abraham's proclamation of the one all-seeing God. After this proclamation men who had worshiped kings and idols came soon to realize that the God of the spirit was the only rightful sovereign. They came soon to understand that with the same spiritual Father men were brothers both here and hereafter. It followed immediately that men were spiritual and political equals, and liberty, equality, fraternity, dawned upon the human race. Thus God is the source of liberty and religious freedom the basis of political independence. Voltaire, the scoffer, the satirist, but above all the analyst profound, expressed this truth with evident application to the American Republic when, raising his withered hands above the grandson of Benjamin Franklin who had besought for the youth the aged philosopher's benediction, he whispered, "God and Liberty." It was the idea of the one God and the resultant conception of human brotherhood that made the Hebrew nation the world's first self-governing commonwealth and enabled it to embody the highest religious and civic ideals six centuries before Greece knew an alphabet and more than a thousand years before the Latins founded Rome.

These principles were the basis of the Mosaic code, a code which is to-day the framework of civilization and government, a code which enters elementally into the civil and criminal codes of all modern states, a code which taught the elevation of woman, the love of home, the sanctity of property and life, the observance of the Sabbath, charity, fraternity, representative government, systematic education, contempt for luxury and extravagance, equal rights, and rigid justice. These principles have made the Hebrew commonwealth a model and a light in the reformations, awakenings, and revolutions of the world. In the American Revolution arguments in behalf of independence and against all despotism were liberally drawn from Judaic literature and teaching. Throughout the colonies the Hebrew nation was cited as the ideal republic. On the day the Continental Congress declared our independence Franklin, Adams, and Jefferson were appointed to prepare a seal for the United States and for a device they selected a representation of Moses watching the Red Sea as it enveloped Pharaoh, adding beneath the picture the words, "Resistance to tyrants is obedience to God." It is of more than human import that the Hebrew commonwealth, embodying the ideas of God and liberty, was the chief example of the American patriots and that the United States, representing in the spirit underlying its institutions the Hebrew nation more closely than does any other country, was the first government since the final destruction of Jerusalem, seventeen hundred years before, under which the Hebrew people were admitted to unrestricted and coequal citizenship.

The beginnings of the United States were essentially religious, and a divine purpose may be seen in the events which made possible our country and its institutions. Surely there was omnipotent design in the fact that the invention of printing, the discovery of America, and the European Reformation took place within the same century. The printing press brought the Bible to the people, and they rose from the serfdom of ages to stand before God as untrammeled children; before each other as brothers and as equals. With the Reformation began the movement to free the soul, the brain, the arm of man—a movement which culminated on this hemisphere in the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. Despotism was assailed, and wars, commotions, persecutions raged through Europe. That this movement might reach fruition in a new world undisturbed by the errors and oppressions of the old, God pointed the frail caravels of Columbus to these virgin shores. It was of more significance than even Columbus dreamed that on landing at Salvador his first act was to kneel upon the soil and dedicate the infant continent to the King of Kings. Thus under the especial favor of Providence America began. I now propose to show that the finger of God may be traced in every crisis of American history and that the dominant note of American character has been an unfaltering trust in the wisdom and the justice of Omnipotence. [Applause.]

It is worthy of remark that every effort to exploit this country for sordid ends failed utterly; the adventurers in search of gold and notoriety came to grief. On the contrary, the valiant spirits who braved the trackless tides, the storms, the savages, the snows to establish in America a government of the free, who fled religious and political oppression to erect upon these shores the altars of religious and political liberty—the Puritan, the Huguenot, the Catholic, the Quaker, the Walloon, the Waldensian, the Covenanter, the Lutheran, the Cavalier, the Dissenter, the Highlander, the Moravian, the Jew—in fact, the hosts of earth's exiled and earth's wronged—flourished here under difficulties so tremendous, such pestilences, famines, massacres, and dissensions that their preservation and advancement can be attributed to no other source than the God whose worship they came to maintain in its original purity, whose freedom they were to transmit to posterity and eternity. [Applause.] Before commencing each day's work the colonists at Jamestown assembled in the little church to invoke the blessings of Jehovah. "Doubt not," they wrote their friends at home, "God will raise our state and build His church in this excellent clime." When, in 1619, the House of Burgesses, the first legislative body in America, was established in this colony one of its first resolutions was a recognition of God. When the little congregation of John Robinson in the north of England was driven by the minions and measures of intolerance to Holland to become immortal pilgrims in the cause of liberty and truth, they were animated by a deathless trust in God. Before landing on Massachusetts soil, after leaving Holland, they paused to compose upon the Mayflower our first written Constitution, and they began that remarkable document in the name of God. The first sentence summarizes the doctrines of God and freedom on which American institutions rest. Throughout colonial times the fires of faith and brotherhood were kept ablaze by Higginson, Hooker, Eliot, Mayhew, Williams, Davenport, Fox, Penn, Barclay, Keith, Whitfield, the Wesleys, Edwards, and other champions of an unshackled gospel, an unshackled manhood. They originated the religious revivals which have become so splendid a feature of American life. The first work of the first printing press in America, established in 1639, was a metrical version of the Psalms.

The life of Washington, the buttress of the Republic in its most perilous emergencies, shows instance after instance of divine intervention. One of the most notable of these was his preservation during the slaughter of Braddock's troops on the Monongahela in the French and Indian war. So marvelous was his escape that he at once accredited it to the Almighty. Writing his brother, Augustine, he said: "By the all-powerful dispensation of Providence, I have been protected beyond all human probability or expectation; for I had four bullets through my coat, two horses shot under me, yet escaped unhurt, though death was leveling my companions on every side around me." Indeed, his survival excited universal comment. One of the foremost clergymen of the time, Rev. Samuel Davis, voiced the general opinion when he referred to Washington, in a sermon shortly after Braddock's defeat, as "that heroic youth, Colonel Washington, whom I can not but hope Providence has hitherto preserved in so signal a manner for some important service to his country." [Applause.]

The first Continental Congress, with the assembling of which the Revolution morally began, was opened with prayer. On the second day the distinguished body met under the disturbing influence of a rumored bombardment of Boston. Indignation was on every brow, sympathy in every heart. The thirty-fifth Psalm, wherein David recites his wrongs and cries out for the shield and buckler of the Lord, was read by the Chaplain with such fervor and such effect that he broke into a thrilling prayer for the colonists and that John Adams afterwards expressed the belief that Heaven had ordained this passage to be read that morning. When the Chaplain concluded there was the silence of death. Then rose Patrick Henry, and, under the impulse of that tremendous moment exclaimed in part: "The distinction between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers, and New Englanders are no more. I am not a Virginian, but an American." [Applause.] With that sentence, inspired by more than human surroundings, the birth of American citizenship was complete, the germ of the American Republic was in flower. During the following year Henry expressed a similar sentiment when in his memorable address before the Virginia Revolutionary convention he said that there was a just God who would raise up friends to fight the battles of the colonists and welcomed liberty or death.

Ethan Allen crowded American history into a single sentence when he demanded the surrender of Ticonderoga in the name of the Great Jehovah and the Continental Congress. On Cambridge Common, the day before Bunker Hill, we see the president of Harvard praying among our troops. The colonists began the American Revolution with prayer, and before the war was over the British, too, had learned to pray. [Applause.] On assuming command of the Continental Armies, Washington expressed the most unqualified confidence in the Deity. So desperate was the situation at the outset of a struggle between a fledgling nation and one of the foremost powers of the earth, such the destitution, lack of discipline, lack of numbers among the colonials, that Washington wrote a friend in confidence: "We are now left with a good deal less than half-raised regiments and about 5,000 militia. * * * If I shall be able to rise superior to these and many other difficulties which might be enumerated, I shall most religiously believe that the finger of Providence is in it to blind the eyes of our enemies." Can we doubt the partiality of the Creator when we recall the unspeakable suffering, the disparity of strength, the bitter winters, the ragged uniforms, the bloody prints of shoeless feet, the poverty of state and individual, the inherent weakness of government, the treacheries and intrigues through which the patriot cause ascended to consummate victory?

Can we question the especial aid of the Ruler of all Worlds when we see the fog refuse to rise that August morning in 1776 until our Army had retreated from almost certain annihilation on Long Island, and then some five years later observe the dawning daylight drive the escaping Cornwallis back to Yorktown and surrender? Can we deny the interposition of divinity when in the gloomiest hours of the conflict we see the tattered Continentals retreat barefooted over frozen roads, crossing, when almost overtaken, the Catawba and the Yadkin, whose waters successively rose to delay their pursuers? Is it strange that after the decisive victory of Yorktown the Continental Congress immediately proceeded to a church and, after expressing public thanks to God, proclaimed a day of national thanksgiving, in which the entire country joined most fervently? Is it strange that Washington, on surrendering his commission, deemed it an imperative duty to commend the nation to the continued protection of Omniscience?

As the first act of Columbus on American soil was a recognition of Providence, it was remarkably fitting that nearly three centuries later the first act of the First Congress under the present system, after hearing the inaugural address of Washington, which glowed with expressions of gratitude to Heaven, was to assemble in a church and there unite in supplication to the Lord of all. Before the adjournment of that initial session Congress requested the President to recommend a "day of public thanksgiving and prayer, in acknowledgment of the many signal favors of Almighty God, and especially His affording the people an opportunity peaceably to establish a constitutional government for their safety and happiness." De Tocqueville, the great French historian and philosopher, who wrote the most accurate and remarkable analysis of American character yet given to mankind, observed after visiting the United States in the first half of the last century: "It never must be forgotten that religion gave birth to Anglo-American society." It is hardly possible to dissociate the miraculous growth of the American Republic in population, in territory, in material and spiritual strength, in world influence, and importance from the cooperation of an agency more than mortal. Especially is this true when we consider the questions of internal policy which, after threatening the existence of the country for seventy years, were not permanently settled until the altars of a reunited country had been christened in the blood of brothers.

When in the exciting hours of the Clay compromise of 1850 the strife of contending factions was angriest, Benton, his turbulence for once subdued, said, concerning the solution of the pending problem: "It seems to be above human reason. But there is a wisdom above human, and to that we must look." On leaving his home at Springfield, in February, 1861, for the assumption of the Presidency, when the signs of the storm through which he was to guide the imperiled nation were everywhere apparent, Lincoln voiced the traditional American trust in God when he said to the neighbors who had come to say farewell:

"My friends, no one not in my position can appreciate the sadness I feel at this parting. A duty devolves upon me which is perhaps greater than that which has devolved upon any other man since the days of Washington. He never would have succeeded except for the aid of Divine Providence, upon which at all times he relied. I feel that I can not succeed without the same divine aid which sustained him. I hope you, my friends, will all pray that I may receive the same divine assistance, with which success is certain."

Both sides in the appalling conflict which ensued, leaders and followers alike, Lincoln, Davis, Grant, Lee, McClellan, Jackson, and other mighty figures, exhibited a heroism in march and charge, in camp and Cabinet, a devotion to truth as each conceived it, that could proceed only from the most unlimited faith in the Infinite Preserver. [Applause.]

Both sides achieved eternal victories, the one having preserved the nation, the other having defied annihilation and challenged death for its conception of the right. [Applause.] When the assassination of Lincoln in April, 1865, had filled the world with gloom and dread and disturbances more violent than those of war seemed imminent, we hear the voice of Garfield as he lifted the American flag above the rioters in New York, "God reigns and the Government at Washington still lives." Immediately the country caught the spirit of this matchless appeal, and another crisis had been mastered. It was about this time, at the culmination of the period which established the unity and permanency of the Republic that Congress, as if by inspiration, ordered the sentence "In God we trust," a sentence summarizing the history and reflecting the character of the American people, to be inscribed upon the nation's coinage. For more than forty years it has there remained to remind us of our origin and the world of our faith. Who can doubt that its educational and ethical value has been immense? Who will not regret its displacement on certain coins to make way for the Gaudens design, a design which shows on one side a woman in savage headdress, on the other a Roman eagle in predatory flight—the one side a degradation of woman, the other a eulogy of war? [Applause.]

It is particularly appropriate that the inscription "In God we trust" should appear upon our national moneys. The coinage of a country is the most concrete and universal evidence of its sovereignty. Is it not fitting that this most elemental expression of government should contain a recognition of the power to which the Government owes its foundation, its growth, its glory? Again, the coinage is, as a rule, the first and most general token of government with which American children and foreigners seeking our citizenship become familiar. It enters fundamentally into the people's lives and thoughts and hopes. It is the vitalizing element in commerce, society, and government. Bearing the words "In God we trust," it would suggest to every child and every citizen the genius of American institutions; it would lead every foreigner to study American ideals in the light of a proper philosophy. [Applause.] It is a poor time to remove this motto when economic disaster shrouds the land, when the successful and the rich of yesterday are the suicides and paupers of to-day. For the reasons enumerated, I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the beautiful and stately sentence "In God we trust," so symbolic of American history, American aspiration, American faith, should be permanently inscribed upon the coinage of the United States. [Applause.]

God has undoubtedly watched over us and directed us to national greatness, and I firmly believe that it is because we are a God-fearing nation. We enjoy freedom's blessings at home, and through the work of Almighty God our blessings are going out to bless others in every land and in every clime. He has given it to us to be the miracle workers of the world's history. Rome's development and decline stretched through a period of twenty centuries, but Rome, when she was mistress of the world, was insignificant as compared with the United States of to-day.

The great powers of Europe have had fourteen or fifteen centuries of development, and even at the period which we fix as their beginning their territory was inhabited. We are only one hundred years from the uninhabited wilderness, and are greater than any of them.

Our wealth is greater than that of the world was two generations ago. Some of us here to-day were alive when the combined world's wealth was not as great as that of this country is now.

In production and consumption we far surpass any other nation, and are gaining so rapidly that the children of to-day will live to see the United States produce and consume more than all the balance of the world produces and consumes now.

And all the balance of the world is rushing forward far more rapidly than ever before, the impetus being given largely by American invention and American example. It was a quiet old world when the new Republic was born a century and a third ago; but the infant, as it grew in strength, set new examples and circulated new ideas that have put the whole world in motion.

Our people have worked miracles at home and their influence has wrought them abroad. What did the world know of the rights of man until we taught them? Little Switzerland was pursuing her quiet way before American ideas attracted attention; and Poland, which was in some respects an elective government, seemed to exist only to show that an elective government was the worst possible kind. Great Britain was a limited monarchy, but everywhere else in Europe was complete despotism.

Now France is a Republic, and the power of the people is felt in every nation of Europe except Turkey. Even the autocrat of Russia has surrendered much of his power to a congress elected by the people; and, across the line in Asia, Persia has come into the family of nations that acknowledge the rights of the governed.

Japan proudly proclaims her indebtedness to the United States. Washington Irving represents Rip Van Winkle as sleeping twenty years. Japan had slept as many centuries when America bade her awake. She is now one of the powers of the earth, improving on her borrowed civilization until she stands abreast with the first. The torch that was lighted in America a century and a third ago has lighted others and still others until the whole world is aglow.

We are passing away, and some who are here now must pass without seeing the wonders of the future. The world has advanced more during the last three-quarters of a century than during the six thousand years of its previous history, and the forward impetus is greater than it ever was before. Our country leads and has contributed more than any other to the civilization of the present day. Other nations have produced as great thinkers; we have applied the ideas. While others theorize, we put their theories into practice. What the next fifty years will show no man can conceive, as no man fifty years ago could have conceived the wonders the last half century has brought to life.

We can not forecast invention, but we can form some idea of our nation's growth. We can judge it by the past. If our rate of gain in population during the last half of the nineteenth century should continue through the first half of the twentieth, more than a quarter of a billion people will live in the United States forty-two years hence. The South alone will then be more populous than any nation of Europe is now, except Russia, and as populous as any two nations of Europe, except Russia and Germany combined.

Our wealth in fifty years will be greater than the present combined wealth of the world, and our power will be beyond comparison with that of any other nation.

But if our successors should prove worthy of our predecessors this vast power will be a security instead of a danger to the balance of the world. The spirit of peace and justice has been the crowning glory of our Republic. No nation is so powerful as to inspire our fear; no nation so weak as to invite oppression from us. Our nation has been more forbearing to the weak than to the strong.

In its early youth our Republic assumed the duty of protecting its younger sisters on this continent. It was a nation of only 10,000,000 people that was back of President Monroe's declaration to the world that the powers of Europe must not extend their territory in this hemisphere. The 10,000,000 were enough to secure respect for the Monroe doctrine, but for which South America and Mexico and the West Indies would probably now be dependencies of European nations.

Let other nations glory in the wars they have fought and won. America's glory is in the wars she has prevented. Let others boast of the nations they have overcome. America can boast of the nations she has protected. Let other nations exert their influence through the crash of firearms and the gleam of steel; America wields a far more powerful influence by her appeals to reason and justice. She has force to use in self-defense if necessary, but as the years add to her strength the possibility of a need of defense becomes more and more remote.

Free men will often differ in opinions. No two will always agree. The differences between Americans resulted once in war. Considering the differences between the conditions, North and South, that war was inevitable from the beginning. The only wonder is that it was so long delayed. It has been fought, and it has resulted in a unification of conditions that leaves no further possibility of conflict.

The war is now remembered as a test of American manhood, and neither side need feel ashamed of the result. In fact, all Americans can share in the honor won on both sides, for it was won by Americans. Our Northern-born President never neglects an opportunity of claiming kinship to the men who wore the gray, and the only rivalry between the North and South now is as to which would be readiest to respond to the nation's call.

As a nation we have reason to feel proud of our past and satisfied with our present, and we can look forward to the future with a confidence that the realization of our national destiny will be far beyond the brightest dreams of the men who staked their all on the effort to found a government attributing its powers to the consent of the governed.

If we would continue as the greatest of the nations of the world we must continue our faith in God. The history of the nation that forgets God is sooner or later written in ruin. Let us therefore fight infidelity until it is literally stamped out of our country. Let us not retrograde, but rather let us go forward. Let us do nothing that smacks of national infidelity. Let us not put an "infidel money" out upon the world, but let us put out the coin that says to all the world "Americans are a God-fearing and God-loving people." I hope this bill will pass by a unanimous vote.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLERBE].

Mr. ELLERBE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to make a speech, but I simply desire to read to the House a few lines, and every Member of the House will soon discover that I am not the author of them.

They are as follows:

A RECESSIONAL.

[After Kipling.]

God of the nation, known of old,
Supreme, all-powerful, and just,
No longer on our coins of gold
Dare we inscribe: "In Thee we trust."
Lord God of Hosts, forsake us not;
We have forgot, we have forgot!

Our fathers did not ask in vain
When, unashamed, they sought Thine aid;
Now, in our day of stress and strain,
We falter in our faith—afraid.
God of our country, long forgot,
Forsake us not, forsake us not!

We bowed before the shrine of wealth
And, drunk with riches, went astray;
Restore, O God, the nation's health
And lead it in the old true way.
In sorrow, shame, and vain regret
We plead that Thou will spare us yet.

Forgive our willful waste, our pride,
Our foolish pomp and wicked lust;
Once more be Thou the nation's guide
That we may say, "In God we trust,"
For thoughtless act and idle word,
Thy mercy on Thy people, Lord!

[Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, it is, I trust, with no feeling of irreverence that I rise to oppose the restoration of the motto under discussion to our national coin. If you will place that motto over there in this Chamber so that every Member of this House can daily see and read it, if you will place it over here where the Speaker can see and read it [laughter and applause], if you will inscribe it over every door of the Capitol and over the entrance to every public building in this city, I will gladly support and commend your action. [Laughter and applause.] But when you inscribe it upon our coins it seems to me rather a show of conventional hypocrisy than of patriotic reverence. Who considers in his business dealing with his fellow-men whether God is approving or disapproving his act? Does he look at that motto on the coin and consider its sacred meaning as he takes money, by fair or foul means, from the pockets of his fellow-men? What is our coin but a medium of commerce? And what is commerce and what is business but the irrepressible and eternal conflict of human interests? It is a medium of secular, and not sacred, transactions. It is human interests of a severely material kind that we are dealing with in this discussion. [Applause.] Are financiers, speculators, and business men generally, impressed with the reverential sentiment contained in the words "In God we trust," inscribed on the coin they are handling? Is there one in every thousand who stops to read it, or who wants to read it, especially if he is contemplating a financial coup? Who considers its sacred significance in a business transaction? No one. And if so, does it not seem rather a device of hypocrisy and irreverence than of sincerity and veneration?

I repeat, if you will inscribe this motto above the Speaker's chair, where every Member of this House may see it from day to day, and over here on this side where the Speaker may see it, and upon the architrave of every public building in the country, upon the front of every church, and above the door of every schoolhouse throughout the land, we will say "Amen" and support you in that, but not in placing it upon what our Bible calls "filthy lucre," where it seems to me more of an irreverent conventionality than a genuine sentiment of devotional sincerity. If I believed it made men more reverent and honest by being on our coin, then I would say by all means restore it, not only to the coin, but inscribe it on our paper currency, for I do not know of anything that we need more of just now than reverence and honesty. Let us have less of empty pretense and more of solid sincerity. It thus appears to me to be a useless if not an irreverent ostentation upon our coin, and I agree with the President that this motto should be omitted therefrom.

Mr. McKINLEY of Illinois. I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE].

Mr. PEARRE. Mr. Speaker, having had the honor of being chairman of the subcommittee which prepared the minority report, which was unanimously adopted by the whole committee, I felt that it would not be necessary to add anything to what I said in that report. But there are one or two things to which I desire to advert which have been stated in the debate. Some gentlemen on the other side seem to take exception to what the President did, and find fault with the President by reason of the issuance of an order by which this motto was dropped from certain denominations of coin upon which it had previously been inscribed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States, in connection with that order, has given his reasons, and there is nothing in that order showing anything that partisanship or any hypercritical or hypocritical criticism can pervert, and I find nothing in that order which would indicate any suggestion of irreverence or lack of Christian spirit upon the part of the President when he took that action.

The President of the United States then and there registered not only his approval of the sentiment "In God we trust," not alone as an individual and personally, but also as a great public servant. He is a Christian man in every relation of life; and not only a Christian man, but a practical Christian man, both as an individual and as a public servant, and he has endeavored to impress Christian principles upon public affairs. To such an extent has he done this, Mr. Speaker, that some of his critics have suggested or pretended to think that the President of the United States had gone too far in trying to impress the Ten Commandments upon the legislation of this country. So much, Mr. Speaker, for the criticism which has been made upon the President of the United States for the order that he has issued. Thank God he has, Mr. Speaker, and in doing so has had the courage to declare for moral reform in the face of the most powerful interests.

There is another matter to which I wish to advert, which has arisen in this debate, and it is to this effect: The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KÜSTERMANN] says, Why put it only upon certain denominations of the coinage; why not put this glorious motto, "In God we trust," upon the pennies and the dimes and the nickels, which are in the hands of the bootblacks and those who are poor and humble and unable to have large denominations of money?

He also suggests that upon the very large denominations of our paper money we should impress it—especially should we print it in large and glaring letters upon the thousand and ten thousand dollar bills, in order that those who in their greed for gold, in the struggle for wealth, have been trampling upon their fellow-men and forgetting the rights of the individuals and the duty of man to God, may have it brought to their attention. There is another objection to this bill, Mr. Speaker, which has been suggested—that made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORDON]. He suggests that we should not impress this motto upon these various denominations of the coinage, but that we should emblazon it above the Speaker's desk, so that the Members of this House could see it, and that we should put it yonder before the Speaker, so that the Speaker may see it; and he says that if we will put it over our churches and our places of public business, then he will vote for it.

These gentlemen, therefore, favor the use of this motto to even a greater extent than proposed by this bill. It can be no real objection to this bill that it does not go far enough. This bill simply restores this law and the practice under the law as it obtained before the President's order was issued, and yet we are told certain gentlemen oppose this bill because it does not go far enough. The President's record, Mr. Speaker, on moral or Christian questions needs no defense at my hands. He has urged the incorporation of Christian principles in all legislation and in the administration of the laws. Under his great Administration there has been a wonderful moral regeneration in this land. How vain the effort, therefore, to attempt to squeeze partisan advantage out of this strictly nonpartisan matter. Restore the motto "In God we trust," so beautifully phrased by Maryland's patriot son, Francis Scott Key, who, in concluding his wonderful apostrophe to "The Star-Spangled Banner," the words and music of which thrill the blood of all true Americans in every clime, said: "And this be our motto, 'In God is our trust.'"

Mr. McKINLEY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in the recent successful efforts of the police of Chicago to ferret out the nesting places of anarchy in that city it was found that in the literature from which their children were taught there was an avowed purpose to banish God from the minds of the rising generation. Sir, I want to put myself on record as against the purpose of the anarchists in this as in all other respects. [Applause.]

The teaching influence and the rallying power of emblems and mottoes have been recognized in all ages and by all nations. As a rule, they concrete in material form or express in briefest language some great thought or purpose or movement until they become dear to the people adopting them. The origin of these mottoes and emblems is often of greatest interest and lends enduring influence and value.

The ignominious cross upon which was consummated the sublimest sacrifice in human history is to-day the emblem of hope to unnumbered millions of men in every quarter of the earth. The sacrificial wood upon which was pinioned the body of the Nazarene has been glorified by his followers, and the "In hoc signo vinces" moves in resistless march to the conquest of the world.

The flag of our country is emblematical of all we hold dear in our national life. Floating as it does over the halls of legislation, over the garrisons of our soldiers, the battle ships of our sailors, and the schoolhouses of our children, it is a constant reminder not only of a glorious past, but an inspiration to a still more glorious future, because it speaks the language of patriotic devotion and sacrifice to our common country.

The motto, "In God we trust," had its origin during the civil war. It is one of the heritages of that gigantic struggle, between two sections of a great people reading the same Bible and praying to the same God. Happily now we are a reunited country, and the heart of the people still goes out to the God of nations as of individuals. We of the North join hands with you of the South and say, your God is our God, as your people are our people. [Applause.]

The fathers who founded this nation had faith in God. It ill becomes their sons to even appear to turn back the hand upon the dial plate of time. Were it a question de novo, it would present a different aspect. But we can not now afford to have the childhood and youth of the nation infer, however erroneous that inference might be, that the Congress had repudiated the faith of the fathers or attempted to becloud that of their children. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, let us have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. As many as are in favor of having the yeas and nays will rise and stand in their places until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-eight gentlemen have arisen.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the other side. As many as are opposed will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-five gentlemen have arisen. On this question the ayes are 38 and the noes are 135, a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 259, nays 5, answering "present" 4, not voting 120, as follows:

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations reported the bill (H. R. 19355) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order on the bill.

CASES ON APPEAL FROM ALASKA.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13649) providing for the hearing of cases upon appeal from the district court for the district of Alaska in the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit.

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter all appeals, writs of error, and other cases coming from the district court for the district of Alaska to the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit shall be entered upon the docket and heard at San Francisco, in the State of California, or at Portland, in the State of Oregon, or at Seattle, in the State of Washington, as the trial court before whom the case was tried below shall fix and determine: Provided, however, That at any time before the hearing of any appeal, writ of error, or other case, the parties thereto, through their respective attorneys, may stipulate at which of the above-named places the same shall be heard, in which case the case shall be remitted to and entered upon the docket at the place so stipulated and shall be heard there.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SULZER. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. HAYES. I object.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. KAHN. I demand a second.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York [Mr. ALEXANDER] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is entitled to twenty minutes. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. I yield so much of the twenty minutes as he desires to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that appeals from the district court of Alaska may be heard either at Seattle, Portland, or San Francisco, as the trial court in which the case is tried may fix or determine, unless it is stipulated to the contrary. The parties may agree to hear it at either one of the places. As the law exists to-day all these cases are heard in San Francisco, and the Alaskan litigants are compelled to pass through Seattle to San Francisco and return, a distance of about 2,000 miles, in order to present their cases. This bill is to make it so that appeals may be heard where it is to the best interests of and most convenient to the litigants. Every person coming from Alaska passes through Seattle. There is no direct connection between San Francisco and Alaska. The committee unanimously reported this bill this session and unanimously reported it at last session. It does seem to me there can be no objection on the part of anyone to the Alaskan litigants having their cases heard where it will be most advantageous for them. I yield back the time to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the effect of this bill simply to permit the trial court in the district of Alaska to designate either the United States circuit court at Seattle or San Francisco to hear the appeals?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Or Portland. I want to state this for the benefit of the House, that I negleced to state before that the circuit court holds a session at Seattle and Portland. They already go there, and it is no inconvenience to them to hear these appeals in either of those cities?

Mr. KEIFER. They are the same judges?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The same judges hold terms there.

Mr. MANN. And the same circuit, as I understand it?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The same circuit and the same judges.

Mr. KEIFER. The only difference is they do not pay their board in San Francisco if they go to Portland?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is the only difference, except that San Francisco attorneys might not be represented when the appeals are heard in Seattle and Portland. That is all there is in the question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask what the difference will be in the expense to the litigants in coming down from Alaska and stopping at Seattle or Portland rather than going to San Francisco?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is a good deal. That is a matter you can not say definitely. I have received letters from attorneys who state it will amount to $1,500 to $3,000 a case.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question? I understand this bill has the approval of the leading members of the bar of Alaska?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It has met the approval of the members of the bar generally in Alaska and has met with the approval of the Alaska Club. I had letters on file with the Judiciary Committee from practically every attorney in Alaska approving this bill, but, unfortunately, those papers have been lost.

Mr. SULZER. Just another question. This bill also has the approval of the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. CALE], has it not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes, sir.

Mr. SULZER. And it had been unanimously reported from the committee?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Twice.

Mr. SULZER. I understand it passed the House last session of Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It passed the House by unanimous consent a year ago.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion this bill should pass. I am informed the legal fraternity, and the people generally, of Alaska favor it, and anything I can do in Congress to carry out their wishes I shall always be glad to do. As a matter of fact, at present practically all appeals from the district court of Alaska must be heard at San Francisco. There is no direct communication between San Francisco and Alaska, so that the litigant in Alaska, in order to attend the court of appeals in San Francisco, must pass through Seattle, both going and on his return, and travel at a considerable expense about 2,000 miles farther than if the case were heard at Seattle. There is now annually held at Seattle a term of the circuit court, and to hear such appeals there, as the best interests of the Alaska litigants might require, would be of little inconvenience to the court. It is the desire of the members of the bar and of the business interests of Alaska, I am informed, that some provision be made so that Alaska appeals need not be heard in San Francisco except in cases where the circumstances justify it. This desire of the people of Alaska was strongly urged before the committee by the Hon. THOMAS CALE, Delegate from that Territory. It is claimed by the attorneys of Alaska that if their appeals could be heard in Seattle it would enable them in many cases to attend to them in person, whereas at present they are compelled to employ San Francisco attorneys to represent them in the court of appeals. This is all I care to say, and I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, it is true that this bill did pass the House at the last Congress, and it was reported unanimously from the Committee on the Judiciary. But the members of the California delegation at that time, not being fully informed upon the subject, made no objection. The situation is this: There are three terms of the circuit court of appeals in the city of San Francisco, and there is one term in Seattle and one term in the city of Portland.

The term in the city of Seattle is held in September, and I think continues for about two weeks. Then the court goes to Portland, and I think it holds a term there for two weeks; but its records, its library, and its principal place of business are in the city of San Francisco.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Have they a library in San Francisco since the earthquake and fire?

Mr. KAHN. They have one, but it is not as good as the one that was destroyed by the fire.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was claiming a few days ago that the library was gone; that there was nothing but a few old text-books left.

Mr. KAHN. I stated that they have a library there, but it is not as good as the one that was destroyed by the fire.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is there not a good law library in Seattle and another one in Portland?

Mr. KAHN. There is no doubt about that, but the court has its library in San Francisco.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not suppose the law in that library differs any from that in the Portland and Seattle libraries?

Mr. KAHN. It certainly does not. But the court has its offices in San Francisco. It goes up to Seattle once a year for a few days, and goes to Portland once a year. Its headquarters are in San Francisco.

The entire court is opposed to this legislation. The governor of Alaska told me personally that there was no demand from the bar of Alaska for this legislation.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. He did not appear before the committee.

Mr. KAHN. But the governor told me that I might make the statement, that there was no demand for it from the bar of Alaska, and quote him to that effect. As far as the expense to litigants is concerned, it is practically insignificant, for this reason: The men who practice law in Alaska before the Federal courts there have their correspondents in Seattle, in Portland, in San Francisco, and in practically all the cities of the Pacific coast. They do not go down to those cities themselves, as a rule, but they send their papers to their correspondents. The questions heard before the circuit court of appeals are upon points of law raised at the trial of the case. It does not require the presence of the litigants when those questions come up in the circuit court of appeals. I say the lawyers in Alaska have their correspondents in San Francisco, and these latter argue the cases in the appellate court. Now, there is nothing in existing law to prevent a man having his case heard in Seattle. All that is required is to have the lawyers in the case stipulate that it may be heard in Seattle, and the court under existing law and existing regulations is bound to hear the case there. The gentleman will probably say that the lawyers do not stipulate to that effect. That is not the fault of the law. It is not the fault of the regulations. In conclusion, I submit that it is unnecessary to pass this bill at this time. There is no demand for it from Alaska, so far as I have been able to hear, and I think the existing law meets existing conditions as well as might be expected.

I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] makes a great deal of the point of the expense to litigants going from Alaska via Seattle to San Francisco to have their appeals heard. Every lawyer knows that in a case of this kind the litigants do not attend the court. The questions that arise on these appeals are questions of law, and therefore the litigant does not go at all. This whole matter is nothing but an effort on the part of the attorneys of Seattle to get into a position where they can have a larger proportion of the business that comes from Alaska than they get now. That is all there is to it. It is not a question of the interest of the litigants. It is merely a question of the interest of the lawyers of Seattle.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the court now sat in Los Angeles, would not the gentleman be in favor of moving it to San Francisco?

Mr. HAYES. I should not, under the circumstances.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It would be that much nearer.

Mr. HAYES. I will explain why I should not. If there was any hardship to litigants, if there was any extra expense attending this matter, then I should say there was a reason why this law should be changed, but there is nothing of that kind. It is only a question of whether the attorneys in Seattle shall get a larger proportion of the business than they get now or whether they shall not. That is all there is to it.

The reason why I say it should not be changed is the reason stated by my colleague. The court sits, as a rule, in San Francisco, and not in Seattle and not in Portland. Those are only side terms, and only held a few days once a year. So the court itself is greatly opposed to this. I have had personal letters from the judges of the court of appeals of our circuit, and they object to the passage of this legislation because it will be inconvenient for them. They have their offices in San Francisco, they have their records there, they have their library there, and not in Seattle or Portland.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How is it that San Francisco has the trial of these cases instead of Sitka or some other place in Alaska?

Mr. HAYES. Because there is no term of the circuit court of appeals in Alaska.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would the gentleman object to a change in the law so as to give them a term in Alaska?

Mr. HAYES. I think it would be a great waste of public funds to send the judges up there.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is a court of appeals and it would be competent for Congress to authorize a term there.

Mr. HAYES. Oh, absolutely competent.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If the business is sufficient, why should not there be a term there as well as at Seattle?

Mr. HAYES. There should be a term there if the business is sufficient to warrant it, but business is not sufficient to warrant it, in my judgment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How many cases are there from Alaska heard in San Francisco?

Mr. HAYES. I do not know, but it is not a very large number. The number of cases is not large, but they are often very important; they often involve great interests.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What benefit is it to San Francisco not to have the court held at Seattle and Portland?

Mr. HAYES. The only benefit is that our attorneys get a larger proportion of business than they would if the cases were heard in Seattle.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The hotels get the benefit of it.

Mr. HAYES. That is a very small matter.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will it not be possible for the court of appeals to expedite appeals if they can order them heard in one place or the other where the next session is to be held?

Mr. HAYES. That is not the proposition here. The proposition is to give the trial courts the right to say where the appeal shall be heard. I would have no objection to letting the court of appeals decide where the Alaska appeals should be heard.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Is it not right that the trial court should order the appeal to be heard where it can be heard the quickest, and that is what the bill provides?

Mr. HAYES. It can be heard the quickest in San Francisco, because the court is sitting there nearly all the time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Not always.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. If this bill is to be passed by the House, I should say such action will be taken because the Members believe that it is for the benefit of the people of Alaska and because their interests require it. The gentleman from Washington, in commenting upon that line, said he had received letters or that letters were on file with the Committee on the Judiciary from practically every attorney in Alaska favoring the bill. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is an almost universal desire on the part of the people of Alaska for this legislation? If so, I think their wishes should be heeded.

Mr. HAYES. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts I can only say that I do not want to dispute the word of the gentleman from Washington, but I can say that there are no letters on file with the Judiciary Committee now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman will not say that there have not been those letters on file?

Mr. HAYES. No; but there are none there now. I can repeat what the governor of Alaska said to me—that there was no demand on the part of the attorneys or any other interest in Alaska for this legislation.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman from California has never seen any of these letters?

Mr. HAYES. I have not, and they are not on file with the committee.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman from California to say that the court is in session in San Francisco oftener and longer than it is in Seattle?

Mr. HAYES. I say there are three terms in San Francisco and one of two weeks in Seattle and one of two weeks in Portland. The rest of the time the court is in session in San Francisco.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. The court is in session in the three places all the time?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; practically.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. And only four weeks out of the entire year in the other two States—Washington and Oregon?

Mr. HAYES. That is right; and therefore the appeals can be heard with more expedition and to much better advantage to the litigants in San Francisco than they can as an ordinary proposition in Seattle or Portland.

I say that instead of being a benefit to the litigant, it would be the reverse, if the trial court is allowed to fix the place where these appeals are to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, in reference to the question whether the people of Alaska desire this bill to pass or not, I simply desire to say this, that on yesterday I was talking with an attorney from Alaska whom I have known for a great many years. He stated that practically all of the interests and the attorneys in Alaska were in favor of this bill, except those having connections at San Francisco, and he stated that he was very anxious that a measure of this kind should pass, because very frequently attorneys there, and himself included, had to go to represent their clients at the court of appeals. It is true they might have their correspondents at San Francisco, but every lawyer knows that the attorney who tries a case in the trial court is better prepared to submit that case to a higher court than the man who knows nothing about the facts in the case. For that reason these people are very anxious for it.

This gentleman advised me that he expects to remain in Seattle until along about June, when he is going to San Francisco to the court of appeals to look after some cases for his clients. If those cases could be heard in Seattle, of course his clients would not have to go to the expense of that. It is true that clients do not have to go to San Francisco, but they have to pay the expenses of the attorneys, as every attorney knows, and that, it seems to me, would be a considerable item. It seems to me the only question is a question of convenience and economy to the people of Alaska, and giving permission to the trial court to say if these parties can not agree where it shall be heard, that it may be heard in Seattle or Portland, where these gentlemen admit the court holds a term of court. Suppose a case is heard in Alaska. The time when the court of appeals will be at Seattle is known, of course, and if the trial court knows that it will be held there as soon as briefs can be prepared, he can designate that it be tried there, and this will expedite the transaction of business as well as save to the clients and attorneys considerable expense. It seems to me that there can not be any question about the justice of this legislation, and that it should pass, authorizing the court that tries the case, if the attorneys can not agree where it shall be held on appeal, to designate the place where the appeal may be held. This bill is not in the interest of Seattle or Seattle attorneys, but it is in the interest of the people of Alaska and for the convenience and economy of litigation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill has had consideration before the Committee on the Judiciary in this Congress and in the last Congress. Both sides to the controversy were heard very fully by the committee recently, and the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously reached the conclusion that the bill as reported ought to pass. They have rather a strange condition of affairs regulating the appeals from the courts in Alaska. As the law now is, a party litigant who has lost his case in an Alaskan court can go to an attorney upon the other side and ask him to permit him to take his case—or rather he must go to him and confer with him about where to appeal his case. This gives the absolute power on the part of the attorney residing in San Francisco to have every appeal from Alaska taken for trial to San Francisco. This bill seeks to remedy that situation, and it does so in this way: When a party to the litigation desires to appeal, he can confer with the attorney on the opposite side of the controversy, and they can agree possibly which court to take the appeal to; but in case the lawyers can not agree, then the judge who heard the case certifies to which court of appeals the case shall go. In other words, it takes this arbitrary one-man power out of the hands of the San Francisco lawyer and gives some power back to the lawyers in Alaska and to the lawyers elsewhere in that circuit, and gives power to the judge who tried the case to say where the appeal shall go in the event the attorneys do not agree. I think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I think the House understands this bill. It has been clearly stated by the gentleman who last spoke, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON]. Terms of the United States circuit court are held in both Seattle and Portland. The situation at present is a matter much the same as a question coming up here for unanimous consent. If the attorneys on either side refuse to stipulate that the case go to Seattle or Portland, it necessarily goes to San Francisco. The large corporations in Alaska almost universally have retained lawyers in San Francisco, where the court is more often in session, and therefore if they lose a case in the Alaska courts they will object to its going either to Portland or Seattle simply by refusing to so stipulate, and compel the litigants to go to San Francisco for, or send, counsel there to contest the case. There are libraries in Seattle and in Portland, probably as good as any in San Francisco. As suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] a moment ago, they comprise the law books used in the courts of the United States and the reports of all the States. Therefore all the precedents are in either of those cities. If a client in Alaska is in litigation, his attorney, if from Alaska, must go to Portland or Seattle, and when he reaches Seattle he must go 800 miles farther to San Francisco, or from Portland 600 miles and that can be used as an excuse for adding a very material sum to the attorney fees. While it is not necessary for the client to be present during the hearing in the appellate court, most, if not all, litigants desire to have their case presented on appeal by one or more of the lawyers who tried the case in the trial court and who know something about the material facts involved, as it will the better qualify the attorney to present the points of law the court is to consider. It is nothing more than just and right that this bill should pass.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I yield three minutes to my colleague [Mr. NEEDHAM].

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I think that every member of the California delegation has received communications from the United States judges at San Francisco protesting against this legislation, and it seems to me that they are entitled to be heard as much as anybody else in this matter, as they are perhaps interested as much as anybody else.

This bill, if it passes, puts it in the hands of litigants to stipulate where the case shall be heard, notwithstanding the convenience of the judges who are to hear the case upon appeal; and it seems to me that that is not a good practice. These cases should be heard in most instances where the judges reside, and the judges who are to pass upon these cases, as has been stated, reside in the city of San Francisco.

Now, in this report the Committee on the Judiciary make the statement, which is an absurd one, if I may denominate it as such, that there is no communication between San Francisco and Alaska. Now, if their knowledge of affairs upon the Pacific coast is not better than that——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEEDHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I made the statement that there is no direct communication between San Francisco and Alaska, and I repeat that statement. There is occasionally a fishing boat that runs between San Francisco and Alaska.

Mr. NEEDHAM. There is a regular line of steamers between Nome and San Francisco, and steamers from Nome come direct to San Francisco.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Only fishing boats.

Mr. NEEDHAM. The gentleman is entirely mistaken about that.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am not mistaken. There has not been a regular passenger vessel running between San Francisco and Nome in the last three years.

Mr. NEEDHAM. As a matter of fact, there are a number of vessels that come directly from Nome to the city of San Francisco, and most of this litigation comes from the city of Nome. The most important litigation we have had has come directly from the Nome region, and I take the floor, Mr. Speaker, in behalf of these judges who, it seems to me, should be heard and whose wishes should receive from this House some consideration.

I am sorry to be in the attitude of opposing our friends from Oregon and Washington in this respect. We have usually stood together on all matters of this kind affecting the Pacific coast; but, as I have said, it seems to me that the wishes of the judges should be respected in this particular matter.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. KAHN. I yield two minutes to my colleague [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of California. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it will take two minutes to say what I want to say in connection with the bill. The thing that impresses me most is this: That you are giving to the trial judge the right to say how the appellate court shall manage its business. I doubt whether that can be done. Let us say now, for instance, a case is tried in the district court of Alaska. That ends the jurisdiction and the control of the case so far as that judge is concerned. The minute the notice of appeal is filed, in all of the cases I have ever heard of, the trial court has absolutely nothing more to do. How can it be clothed with authority to say where the appellate court is going to hear the case after it has entirely lost jurisdiction of the matter? It is stated here that attorneys may often step in and regulate the affairs of the appellate court and say where it shall transact its business. I submit that is not the usual nor is it a very orderly nor a very dignified way for the business of the appellate court to be transacted to allow it to be ordered here and there and elsewhere as a judge who has lost jurisdiction over the case may say, or as the attorneys in the case may stipulate.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. One minute.

Mr. KAHN. The statement that has been made here about attorneys from San Francisco going to Alaska to try cases will, I think, upon investigation be found erroneous. As a matter of fact, the Alaska attorneys try all these cases in the district courts of Alaska. When an appeal is taken on questions of law, they send the papers in the case to their correspondents. They have their correspondents in all of the cities where the circuit court of appeals sits. As I have heretofore stated, the correspondent almost invariably argues the case before the circuit court of appeals. The attorney of record seldom appears before that court, so that there is not a particle of expense to speak of to a single litigant in Alaska. As a matter of fact, most of the litigation that is heard in the courts of Alaska arises out of disputes in which San Francisco parties are interested. They have much capital invested up there. It seems to me that it is only fair that the causes on appeal that come from there should be heard in San Francisco. Now, the circuit court of appeals is made up of three circuit court judges; one resides in Portland, one resides in Los Angeles, and the third resides in San Francisco. The court goes to Seattle and Portland for a few days only to hear the causes there. All the rest of the time, practically eleven months in the year, it sits in San Francisco for the hearing of these causes, and they can better be heard there than anywhere else.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the question has been asked about the attitude of the people of Alaska toward this bill. I hold in my hand a telegram from Ketchikan and another from Valdez, Alaska. The one from Valdez is signed by the judge of the court, the United States district attorney, many other officials, and almost the entire business interests of Valdez; the other, from Ketchikan, says, "All the members of the bar and the business interests indorse your bill." I have here a resolution passed by the Alaskan Club unanimously indorsing the bill. Just one word more about this bill. The trial court can fix the hearing of the appeal where it will be most convenient to the litigants. What objection can my friends from San Francisco have to that, if they want to do what is fair. If it is a contest between the lawyers of Seattle and San Francisco, as they assert, do those gentlemen want something that does not belong to them?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I can not; I have only one minute. I want to add that I have never received a letter from but one Seattle attorney in regard to this bill. It is not from the lawyers of Seattle, but the people of Alaska, that I have received indorsements of this bill, and it has been almost unanimously indorsed by the bar of Alaska, who say that it is desirable to have this bill enacted into law that they may have an opportunity for their appeals to be heard where it is most convenient to the litigants. I do not see how anybody can object. My friends from California have seen a new light on the subject. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] one year ago, after this bill had been discussed before the committee and the same questions were presented, placed his "O. K." on it, and it was afterwards passed without objection.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I ask unanimous consent to print these telegrams and resolutions in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The telegrams and resolutions are as follows:

SEATTLE, February 7, 1908.

W. H. HUMPHREY, M. C., Washington, D. C.:

All members of bar, official, and business interests here heartily indorse your bill for the hearing of appeals from Alaska at Seattle or Portland instead of San Francisco. Suggest you wire Juneau, where court is in session.

JUNEAU, ALASKA, January 21, 1908.

Congressman HUMPHREY.

DEAR SIR: Let me add my voice in support of your measure to have Alaska appeal cases heard in Seattle or Portland.

I am a San Francisco man, but in the interest of my Alaska clients, and in the interest of all Alaska, I urge this, the almost prohibitive expense, both in time and money, of going to San Francisco to try our appeal cases should be stopped. I feel satisfied could an expression of Alaskans be obtained it would be almost universally like my wish.

Yours, truly,

E. M. BARNES.

ALASKA CLUB.

This is to certify that at a special meeting of the Alaska Club, properly called and held at 12 o'clock noon on February 12, 1908, at the club rooms of said club, in the city of Seattle, Wash., and presided over by J. E. Chilberg, as president of said club, and at which W. M. Sheffield, secretary, officiated as such, the following resolutions were presented and unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That this club, which is composed of Alaskans and those having interests in Alaska, and who are familiar with the conditions and needs of Alaska, does hereby unanimously indorse, approve, and recommend for passage H. R. 13649, introduced by Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington, and now pending before the first session of the Sixtieth Congress of the United States, entitled "A bill providing for the hearing of cases upon appeal from the district court for the district of Alaska in the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit," and we indorse as correct the statements in the report from the Committee on the Judiciary in favor of said bill, and earnestly request its enactment into law; and it is further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution, properly certified and attested under the corporate seal of this club, be transmitted to the Hon. THOMAS CALE, Delegate from Alaska, to the Hon. WILL E. HUMPHREY, Member of Congress from Washington, who introduced said bill, and to any other officials, Senators or Representatives in Congress who may be interested in the same.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands and affixed the seal of this club at Seattle, Wash., this 13th day of February, A. D. 1908.

J. E. CHILBERG, President.

Attest:
[SEAL.] WM. SHEFFIELD, Secretary.

The question was taken, and (in the opinion of the Chair), two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

STEAMBOAT CREWS.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, I request unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 225. I ask that debate be limited to not exceed forty minutes, and at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman better move to make his motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from New York moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enactment clause and insert:

"That section 4463 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read:

"SEC. 4463. Any vessel of the United States subject to the provisions of this title or to the inspection laws of the United States shall not be navigated unless she shall have in her service and on board such complement of licensed officers and crew as may, in the judgment of the local inspectors who inspect the vessel, be necessary for her safe navigation. The local inspectors shall make in the certificate of inspection of the vessel an entry of such complement of officers and crew, which may be changed from time to time by indorsement on such certificate by local inspectors by reason of change of conditions or employment. Such entry or indorsement shall be subject to a right of appeal, under regulations to be made by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, to the supervising inspector and from him to the supervising inspector-general, who shall have the power to revise, set aside, or affirm the said determination of the local inspectors.

"If any such vessel is deprived of the services of any member of the crew without the consent, fault, or collusion of the master, owner, or any persons interested in the vessel, the vessel may proceed on her voyage, if in the judgment of the master she is sufficiently manned for such voyage.

"If the master shall fail to explain in writing such deficiency in the crew to the local inspectors within twelve hours of the time of the arrival of the vessel at her destination, he shall be liable to a penalty of $50. If the vessel shall have been insufficiently manned in the judgment of the local inspectors, the master shall be liable to a penalty of $100, or in case of an insufficient number of licensed officers to a penalty of $500.

"SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect on July 1, 1908."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think we better have a second, and I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. MANN. I just demanded a second so that the gentleman might explain his bill, which has only recently been reported. I think no one knows anything about it except the gentleman and his committee.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, House bill 225, accompanied by report 1226, amends section 4463 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the complement of crews of vessels and for the better protection of life.

That statute as it now exists is practically null and void, as the courts and the Department of Justice have declared it invalid. In 1892 this question came up in Norfolk, Va., as to the tug Piermont, before Judge Hughes, then sitting in the United States district court for the eastern district of Virginia. He ruled that the board of inspectors could not delegate its power to the local inspectors to fix the matter of crews of vessels. In 1903 a similar case arose and was referred to the Attorney-General, who gave an opinion practically upholding Judge Hughes. Hence the section 4463 could not be enforced and all fines on appeal had to be remitted. The proposed amendment unanimously reported from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries will make the statute a legal one, give the inspection service of the Government authority and make them responsible for the safety of passengers and property on the steamships of the country. The ill-fated General Slocum, in which more than a thousand lives were lost in 1904, and which occurred in the waters of my district, first called the attention of the country to this matter. As a member of the coroners' inquest, which sat for six days, I heard evidence showing the grossest criminal negligence of the officers and the board of directors of the Knickerbocker Steamship Company and the inefficiency and lack of knowledge of the officers and crews of the boats of that line, carrying from twenty-five hundred to three thousand passengers each. The mate on the Slocum was an unlicensed man and the crew roustabouts and loafers, picked up on the wharf, totally inadequate in number and without experience or character. When the vessel was beached on North Brothers Island they all jumped overboard and escaped, except the engineer, who stood by his post. Captain Van Schaick did the best he could with the poor crew, but he was made to suffer for the mean, miserly, incompetent management of the company, and is now serving a term of ten years in Sing Sing prison—that, too, at the age of 72. True, he was to blame for not insisting on a competent and efficient crew and proper devices for fighting fire and saving life. While the proposed bill does not, in my judgment, go far enough to safeguard human life on passenger vessels of the United States, it is a distinctive advance along right lines. Of necessity all legislation is more or less of a compromise; so it was with this measure. This is practically the fourth bill introduced by myself, and includes the one presented by my colleague from New York [Mr. RYAN], to whom the committee acknowledged their indebtedness. The salient features of that bill are engrafted in the pending measure.

This measure as now drawn meets with the approval of Mr. H. B. Walker, the president of all the Altantic coastwise and Gulf lines; of Capt. L. C. Nickerson, of the National Board of Steam Navigation; of Luther B. Dow, esq., general counsel of the American Association of Master Pilots; of Harvey D. Goulder, esq., counsel for the Lake Passenger Association; of Capt. William Livingston, president of the Lake Carriers' Association; of Mr. T. V. O'Connor, president of the licensed Tug Men's Association; of C. L. Warwick, national secretary of the American Association of Masters and Mates and Pilots; of Mr. J. J. Waters, of the Marine Engineers' Society; of the Commissioner of Navigation; of the Supervising Inspector-general, and others.

I would ask to have the report 1226 accompanying the bill read for the information of the Members of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 225) amending section 4463 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass with the following amendments:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the bill printed in italics.

The bill is reported after investigations by the committee covering three months, during which many representatives of steamship and steamboat companies and of organizations of licensed officers, engineers, seamen, and tug men of the seaboard, Great Lakes, and rivers were heard at length and questioned.

It is of the first importance that a bill shall pass at the present session of Congress fixing the number of licensed officers and crew necessary to the safe navigation of inspected vessels, and to secure that result the committee has confined itself to that subject. For this reason it was deemed best not to incorporate in the bill extraneous suggestions such as a statutory definition of "able seaman," somewhat after the British fashion, and similar matters not essential to this legislation, on which an expression of opinion is reserved.

The bill is approved by the Department of Commerce and Labor.

The bill is an affirmation of the principle of Federal control of navigation in an important respect, in which such control has been lacking, although essential, in the judgment of the committee and the Department of Commerce and Labor. Hitherto the laws have provided for the inspection of hulls, boilers, and engines, for life-saving and fire-fighting appliances, and for many of the mechanical details of a vessel. They have failed to provide adequately for the officers and crew necessary to man the vessel and to work its machinery and appliances. Section 4463 of the Revised Statutes, for which this bill is a comprehensive substitute, was enacted thirty-seven years ago, and imperfectly attempted to fix the number of officers and crews of passenger vessels. The Steamboat-Inspection Service has endeavored to supplement that law by regulations in the interest of safety, but these regulations have been declared invalid by the courts and by the Department of Justice.

The bill empowers the board of local inspectors of hulls and boilers to fix the complement of licensed officers and crew necessary for the safe navigation of each vessel of the United States, subject to Federal inspection, whatever be its type—freight, passenger, towing vessel, etc. Vessels under 5 net register tons are usually outside the statutory definition of a vessel of the United States, are too small to require Federal prescription of the crew, and are accordingly exempt from the requirement proposed.

The local inspectors are the officers who inspect annually, and oftener if need be, the hull, boilers, machinery, and equipment of each vessel subject to the inspection laws. They have an intimate acquaintance with the details of all inspected vessels in their respective districts, the trade in which they are employed, the hours of their navigation, the nature of the waters they traverse, and the amount of work on board. These local inspectors, accordingly, are the most competent Federal authorities to determine at all times the number of officers and men required on any given vessel.

The power bestowed by the bill upon the local inspectors is a large power, but the committee does not deem it practicable so to classify vessels by statute that the number of officers and crew could be fixed intelligently by act of Congress. To be just and practicable, such a general statute would have to be accompanied by a long list of statutory exceptions and special rules, which would have to be modified or added to, perhaps, at every session of Congress. In fact, the committee was requested to include in the bill special exemptions for freight vessels, a special twelve-hour rule for certain lake tugs, a rule for certain towboats on the Ohio, and other propositions were alluded to. Doubtless there was merit in some or all of these special suggestions, but the committee decided that such details can better be determined by local administrative officers knowing all the facts than by a committee of Congress. The powers vested in the local inspectors are safeguarded by an appeal from their determinations, first to the supervising inspector, and, if necessary, to the supervising inspector-general.

The bill, by bestowing upon local inspectors the power to fix the complement of officers and crew necessary to the safe navigation of any vessel, thereby also bestows in effect the power to regulate the number of hours of labor on shipboard. The bestowal of such a power of regulation, adapted to varying conditions as they exist on various types of vessels, in various positions on board such vessels, and on various waters, the sea, the lakes, and the rivers, marks a distinct advance in legislation in the interest of labor. Safeguarded, as proposed by the bill, that power can be exercised to secure justice both to labor and capital.

After a vessel has been inspected and the number of her officers and crew fixed, it is sometimes desirable by reason of change of conditions or employment to change the number of the crew. To meet such situations the bill provides that the change in the number of the crew may be made by indorsement on the certificate without requiring a new certificate and a new inspection throughout. Local inspectors may make this indorsement at other ports where a vessel may change her employment, as well as the local inspectors at the port of original inspection.

If for any cause a vessel about to depart is deprived of the services of an officer or other member of the crew without the fault of the master or owner, the vessel may proceed. The master, however, is required under penalty of $50 to report such shortage of officers or crew as soon as practicable. If on such a voyage the vessel be insufficiently manned for safe navigation as to licensed officers, the master becomes liable to a penalty of $500, or to a penalty of $100 if insufficiently manned as to others of the crew. By a general provision of law (sec. 5294, as amended by the acts of December 15, 1894; March 2, 1896, and February 14, 1903) the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is empowered to remit or mitigate such penalties in meritorious cases.

Section 4463 of the Revised Statutes now reads:

"No steamer carrying passengers shall depart from any port unless she shall have in her service a full complement of licensed officers and full crew, sufficient at all times to manage the vessel, including the proper number of watchmen. But if any such vessel on her voyage is deprived of the services of any licensed officer without the consent, fault, or collusion of the master, owner, or any person interested in the vessel, the deficiency may be temporarily supplied until others licensed can be obtained."

Mr. GOULDEN. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. RYAN. I want to ask the gentleman a question, and before I do that I want to read a paragraph or provision in a bill I introduced on January 13 at the request of Mr. T. V. O'Connor, president of the Licensed Tugmen's Protective Association (H. R. 13463). It is as follows:

Local inspectors shall, when issuing a certificate, specify therein or thereon the number, class, or kind of officers and crew required to navigate the vessel with safety at all times, but should the master or owner desiring to operate the vessel not more than twelve hours out of twenty-four in any one day, the local inspectors shall indorse on the certificate of inspection the number and class or kind of licensed officers and crew that are necessary for such reduced period of navigation.

Now, my question is this: Whether or not the bill as reported authorizes the local inspectors to give a certificate to the owner of a vessel who desires to operate it twelve hours out of the twenty-four in any one day as to the crew and the character of licensed officers provided for in the section I have read?

Mr. GOULDEN. In reply to the gentleman, I refer him to page 3, line 9, of the pending bill, which reads:

The local inspectors shall make in the certificate of inspection of the vessel an entry of such complement of officers and crew, which may be changed from time to time by indorsement on such certificate by local inspectors by reason of change of conditions or employment.

That covers it, does it not?

Mr. RYAN. But you do not mention there the case of where an owner of a vessel desires to operate it but twelve hours out of twenty-four in any one day. Now, why was not that provision made? I want to say that I favor this bill, but I trust the language of it will cover the point I make, which I consider one of the most important provisions of the bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is covered in the clause I read a moment ago, which gives the local inspectors the right and power to make that change and to define the number of hours they shall be on duty.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. May I ask the gentleman a few questions?

Mr. GOULDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. In the first place, is this bill unanimously reported from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes; unanimously reported from the committee.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Does this bill include vessels under 5 tons?

Mr. GOULDEN. No, sir.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. They are exempted?

Mr. GOULDEN. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. As I understand it, the bill provides that the local inspectors shall have the absolute power and right to say just how many officers and how many men in the crew a vessel over 5 tons shall carry.

Mr. GOULDEN. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Does not the gentleman think possibly that is putting too much power in the hands of the local inspectors?

Mr. GOULDEN. No; as there is the right of appeal.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. To whom?

Mr. GOULDEN. To the inspector-general, finally.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. But even with the right of appeal, I want to ask the gentleman from New York—of course I am interested in the matter, because I represent in part a coast district—does not the gentleman think we are giving too much power to the local inspectors, who already have a great deal of power?

Mr. GOULDEN. No; I think not. You must place the power and the responsibility somewhere, and there is only one place to put it, and that is in the administrative department of the Government which has control of the matter. Some one must have the authority, and I know of no other place to put it.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Does the gentleman think this bill is in the interest of commerce and navigation, for the protection of life and property?

Mr. GOULDEN. Absolutely so; it admits of no question.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Is that the idea?

Mr. GOULDEN. That is the idea upon which this bill was framed and finally passed by the committee after a full consideration of the subject.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I had been a little apprehensive in reading it that possibly it conferred too much power upon the local inspectors.

Mr. GOULDEN. No; I think not.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is better to have the power in the hands of public inspectors than to have it nowhere, or in the hands only of the owner and master.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I think there is a great deal in that, but as the gentleman can see, and as we all see who have read this bill, it puts a great deal of power in the hands of these local inspectors, and they already have a great deal of power. It may be a very good bill. This is the first opportunity I have had to examine it, coming up as it does in this way this morning.

Mr. GOULDEN. After giving it very careful attention, I will say to my distinguished colleague from North Carolina that I believe the bill is all right.

Mr. STAFFORD. Following the inquiry suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS], I should like to ask whether the committee gave any consideration to the proposition to vest the preparation of the regulations in the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, based upon the character of the vessel, so as not to vest this autocratic power in one individual and so as to provide more uniformity of regulation?

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt this is a very interesting conversation over there, but I am very much interested in this bill, and I should like to have the gentleman from Wisconsin come back on this side, so that we may hear what is being said.

The SPEAKER. The House is in exceptionally good order.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. My question is whether the committee gave any consideration to vesting in the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the authority to compile regulations so as to have more uniformity? Under the provisions carried in the bill I can see nothing but a confusion in regulations, a difference in compliance with the law by reason of varying determinations by the local inspectors.

Mr. GOULDEN. We did give that serious consideration. We had four or five hearings by the committee, and gentlemen from all over the United States were heard, including gentlemen from the Lakes, and they favored this bill as finally agreed on by the committee. This is what they have suggested and recommended.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did the committee give any consideration to the question of having the Secretary of Commerce and Labor determine the smallest complement of men that would be required on a merchant vessel, rather than leaving it to the haphazard judgment of the local inspectors, who may have different views as to the needs of vessels and as to the safety which vessels require?

Mr. GOULDEN. The number of inspectors and the regulations would be fixed by the board.

Mr. STAFFORD. The board of inspectors have nothing to do with the fixing of these matters, the local inspectors fix them.

Mr. GOULDEN. The board of inspectors must prescribe rules and regulations. In my judgment, the bill puts the power and responsibility where it properly belongs.

Mr. STAFFORD. The local inspector has the right to determine the number of men required, and he prescribes the minimum number of crew and officers that must be on the vessel for the full protection of the lives of the persons and the vessel. I am seeking to ascertain whether the committee gave any consideration to the fact that the Secretary should compile some regulations making a minimum requirement according to the character of the vessel. I can not see why there should be the varying regulations in different ports of the country for vessels of the same character and tonnage. Under this bill you leave it to the varying judgment of the different local inspectors, and you will have no uniformity at all. The inspectors of each different port will be the determiner according to his individual ideas.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not seem to have been able to get an explanation of what the bill will do, or a comparison between existing law and what the bill proposes in the time which has been occupied by the gentleman in charge of the bill. And now in the hope that I may get an explanation of that sort so that we may know what the bill is, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] who has agreed to say what the bill will accomplish.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I do not profess to be able to give to the House any very technical information in regard to this bill, but I listened to the hearings before the committee with a great deal of interest, and I felt convinced then that the bill was an entirely meritorious one, and I took considerable interest in a professional way in helping to lick it into shape.

Now, the statute of which this is an amendment by way of substitute provides that—

No steamer carrying passengers shall depart from any port unless she shall have in her service a full complement of licensed officers and full crew, sufficient at all times to manage the vessel, including the proper number of watchmen. But if any such vessel, on her voyage, is deprived of the services of any licensed officer, without the consent, fault, or collusion of the master, owner, or any person interested in the vessel, the deficiency may be temporarily supplied until others licensed can be obtained.

Mr. THOMAS of South Carolina. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. The statute which the gentleman has read says "no steamer carrying passengers," and so forth, and this bill uses the words "no vessel." Now, does not the bill give the right to local inspectors to say how many licensed officers and how many men in a crew you shall put on a sail vessel as well as a steamer, while the old law applied only to steamers?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will answer the gentleman in the same way that the Commissioner of Navigation answered me when I put the query. His reply was that any vessel of the United States subject to the provisions of this title—that is, title in the Revised Statutes in which this section was found and to the inspection laws of the United States, was an expression that was perfectly well known and recognized in the Department and among navigators as one defining all steam vessels above 5 tons burden.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. In other words, the bill only applies to steam vessels, and this language, "any vessel," would only apply to steam vessels?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; subject to the inspection laws.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman this question, whether or not it is not a legal fact that inspectors have no control over sailing vessels at all?

Mr. DOUGLAS. None at all. The provisions of this title, being the language used in this bill, do not apply to sailing vessels at all.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would like to ask another question, whether or not under the old law, section 4463, as it now exists, there is absolutely no power whatever in that section of the statute that enables the inspectors to insert in the certificate anything about the complement of officers?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is exactly, Mr. Speaker, what this bill does. As the author of the bill said before the committee and as he said upon the floor of the House, the bill, in my judgment, does not go far enough, but it certainly is a step in the right direction, because it seems to me that the language of the old bill, simply that they should have a full complement of licensed officers and crew, was insufficient. Who was to decide what a full complement meant? Now, we take it out of the power of the owners to say what a full complement shall be and put it into the hands of an inspector of the Government.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before yielding any further time I would like to call the attention of some gentlemen upon the committee who reported this bill to this fact: As the law now provides—I believe that law is held invalid—the number of the crew may be fixed by the regulations of the board. Is not that the case?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have not been able to find any such law.

Mr. MANN. This bill proposes to leave to the local inspectors in the different districts the full authority to declare the number of licensed officers and the number of the crew. It may be one thing in one place and another thing in another place. The local inspectors may give preference to this or that man as to the number upon his vessel, for a consideration, and that is not an unheard-of anomaly in public affairs. He may put a captain out of business against whom he has any grudge.

Mr. COX of Indiana. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MANN. Oh, let me talk for just a minute. That side of the House has been talking now for twenty-five minutes, and we have gotten no information from them. I do not expect that you will get anything from me, but I hope that what I say may draw some information from somebody else on this bill. Here is a proposition permitting the local inspectors to fine a vessel as he pleases—$100 if the vessel shall have been insufficiently manned in the judgment of the local inspector. The master shall be liable to a penalty of $100, or a penalty of $500 in reference to the officers. That is conferring a bureaucratic power which does not exist, I dare say, anywhere else in the Government. It proposes to extend bureaucracy beyond the most imaginative conception of it in the past.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. In a second. Now, if the gentlemen who have reported this bill can explain in what way the interests of the master, the interests of the owner, are guarded against the unlawful control by inspectors, who may or not be after graft, I would like to have some of them explain it, and I would be glad to yield some time for that purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill provides there may be an appeal from the inspector when he fixes the number of licensed officers and crew that a vessel may have. Is there any provision that the gentleman has been able to find which provides for an appeal from the determination of the inspector fixing the penalty if the vessel comes in to a port and is, in the opinion of the inspector, inadequately manned?

Mr. MANN. Why, there is no appeal under this bill. Not only that, but the gentleman reminds me that the bill provides that the number of licensed officers and crew is to be fixed as may suit the judgment of the local inspectors. I do not know whether there are any licensed crews now or not. The gentleman from New York, in charge of the bill, complained that the Slocum was manned by roustabouts and that this bill would cure that trouble. I take it from that that this bill proposes that the crew shall be licensed. In that respect it is a change of existing law. They have changed the language of the law. The law as it now reads provides for licensed officers and a full crew. Perhaps the gentleman wants to get rid of the words "full crew," and therefore leaves out that term.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is in the law which would correct the conditions that were present in the case of the Slocum disaster, in case there was graft on the part of the owner or the master, as the gentleman suggests might happen, in collusion with the local inspector?

Mr. MANN. In order that that question might be answered, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. DOUGLAS. Before the gentleman yields let me ask him a question. Does not the gentleman's whole argument depend upon the assertion that there is somewhere now in the statute a board provided for which shall make this regulation? The gentleman is misinformed. There is no such statute that I have been able to find. In other words, it is left now to the master.

Mr. MANN. I yielded to the gentleman four minutes of my time on that side, and now he wants to give the information which he did not give in his four minutes. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The object of this bill can be stated in two or three sentences. Heretofore the board in Washington, the supervising board of inspectors, had power to fix the numbers of the crew that a vessel shall carry. They delegated that power to the local inspector. The courts have recently decided that they could not delegate that power, and this bill is to give the local inspectors the power that they have been exercising for many years, that was attempted to be delegated to them by this supervising board. Now that is all there is to this bill. If any man feels himself aggrieved by the act of these inspectors he has the right to appeal to this board and from there to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does not this proposed bill try to give the identical relief that the local inspectors have been trying to give heretofore for the last ten or twelve years without any statute to back it up?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is the object of this bill, namely, to enact into law what has been the custom for many years. Replying to the inquiry of the gentleman, and to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] also, in regard to the fixing of this power with the local inspector, I will say that it is impossible for the supervising board to sit here in Washington and tell how many men shall make a crew on a certain vessel out on Puget Sound, for instance, or down on the Gulf of Mexico. Each vessel varies according to conditions, according to the service, according to the run, and the local inspector is the one who fixes it. He is the only person that has sufficient knowledge to fix it, and he is the person that has been fixing it for many years.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, as has already been stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS], and by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], for the past number of years there has been the lack of a proper statute to enforce this matter. The local inspectors have been undertaking, by rule or custom, as it were, to insert in the certificate of inspection the proper number or complement of officers and men. But it has been determined by the courts—by one Federal court, I believe, in the State of Virginia—and by the Attorney-General of the United States in an opinion, and possibly by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, that that could not be enforced because there was no statute that would compel or permit the local inspectors to insert the complement of men named in the certificate of inspection.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for only a moment?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would like to ask if the local inspectors have not now a right to inspect vessels that come to their particular jurisdiction?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I did not understand the question.

Mr. OLCOTT. Have not the local inspectors now the right to inspect vessels coming within their jurisdiction?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Surely. They have a right to do that, but they can not enforce any penalty.

Mr. OLCOTT. Does the gentleman mean to say that they have not any right to enforce the rules that they make on vessels now?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Exactly, because there is no statute now. They are powerless.

Mr. OLCOTT. Can not they compel a vessel to put a certain number of a crew on that vessel?

Mr. COX of Indiana. No; not under section 4463 as it now exists.

Mr. OLCOTT. I understand this bill is only to correct that condition of affairs?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Absolutely.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is not the distinction this, that now there is an exact penalty fixed by statute that they can impose themselves, and under this bill the inspectors, if they find a vessel is not properly equipped, can say "You are fined," and then the Department can get it?

Mr. COX of Indiana. That is the fact.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is not the same provision about fines in practically every section of the statute relative to navigation?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I understand so; yes, sir.

Mr. BENNET of New York. It is no new departure in that line at all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The present statute provides the crews of these different vessels shall be well disciplined. Why is that language eliminated from this bill?

Mr. COX of Indiana. It was the opinion of the Inspector-General that it did not add anything or take anything from the bill. The bill, as prepared, has been passed by the committee and reported to the House, and has the approval of the Inspector-General.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill, as reported, merely forces the inspector and fixes the number of the crew, as it now exists. Why should not that crew be a well-disciplined crew? Why should not that language be in? The Slocum disaster would have been avoided if the crew on that vessel had been a well-disciplined crew. Under this bill there is no such requirement. It will be presumed that the owners and masters of vessels will employ only well-disciplined officers and men on the vessels. The local inspectors for years have been attempting to do just what this bill proposes; in other words, it proposes by law to give the local inspectors power to do that which they are now attempting to do by rules. The bill is a good, wise, sound measure, and ought to pass.

Mr. MANN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if this bill applies to motor boats?

Mr. COX of Indiana. It applies to all classes of steam vessels upward of 5 tons.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Then it would not apply to gasoline motor boats?

Mr. COX of Indiana. I do not know; I do not think it would.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I have read this bill through as carefully as I could, and still think it puts entirely too much power in the hands of the local inspectors. Under the existing law no steamer can leave a port unless she has a full complement of officers and crew. The language used in the existing law is "steamer."

The committee's bill is very broad and very sweeping, applying to all vessels, large or small, and providing they shall have such a crew as the local inspectors determine. In other words, the local inspectors, when a steam vessel is sailing out of any port, may determine the number of officers and men, and it is left absolutely to the arbitrary power of these local inspectors. They pass also upon the number of men and not upon the qualifications of the men. No appeal, as I understand it, is given to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. And the number of the crew is fixed by the inspectors in any port of the United States. I fear the bill goes too far, although I have confidence in the committee.

Mr. GOULDEN. It does not go far enough, in my judgment. The bill was a compromise measure, as stated before.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, after a fuller consideration of the bill, and recognizing, as has been brought out, without the passage of this law there is no law at present upon the subject; realizing, as I understand, that the opposition to the provisions came from the river-boat interests, and that that opposition has been withdrawn, it seems to me that the bill ought to pass. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with an amendment.

The question was taken, and (in the opinion of the Chair), two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

CONSULAR READJUSTMENT.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I move to suspend the rules and pass the Senate bill S. 4112 with the amendments recommended by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill with amendments:

An act (S. 4112) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," approved April 5, 1906.

Be it enacted, etc., That the classification of consuls-general and consuls in section 2 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," approved April 5, 1906, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Class 9, $2,000: Aguascalientes, Asuncion, Bagdad, Bristol, Campbellton, Cape Gracias, Cape Haitien, Cartagena, Ceiba, Charlottetown, Cornwall, Durango, Ensenada, Fernie, Fort Erie, Gibraltar, Gorée-Dakar, Grenobel, Guadeloupe, Hermosillo, Hobart, La Paz, Limoges, Manzanillo, Maskat, Messina, Moncton, Niagara Falls, Patras, Port Louis, Puerto Cabello, Puerto Plata, Rouen, Saigon, St. Johns (Quebec), St. Pierre, St. Stephen, Salina Cruz, Saltillo, Sierra Leone, Sivas, Stavanger, Suva, Tahita, Tapachula, Turin, Turks Island, Venice."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on the 1st day of July, 1908.

Mr. HARRISON. I demand a second.

Mr. MANN. I demand a second. The gentleman from New York, I understand, is in favor of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. As I am in favor of the bill, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, who is opposed to it, I suppose.

Mr. COUSINS. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, this measure contemplates the abolition of twenty-eight consulates that are thought to be unnecessary now, at a saving of $65,500, and the establishment of seventeen new consulates, at a cost of $49,500; also thirteen offices to be changed in grade, eleven officers at an increase in salary, making $64,500. The whole amount of the expense of this readjustment will be $64,500, a saving of $1,000 a year to the Government. The changes that are proposed to be made are fully discussed in the letter of transmittal of the State Department, and the reasons given seemed to your committee sufficient, and it is believed the service will be thereby greatly benefited. It will be remembered that a couple of years ago, when the so-called "consular reform bill" was passed, there were abolished several consulates deemed not then to be necessary, and there was also the abolition of the fee system; and I am pleased to say to the committee that as a result of that legislation an increase of more than $500,000 has been brought to the Government by return of fees. It is believed that this adjustment now proposed will very greatly improve the service, as well as amount to a saving, as I have said, of a thousand dollars a year in the total appropriation.

I reserve the balance of my time for the present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, two years ago I demanded a second on a bill to reorganize the consular service. The gentleman then in charge of the bill informed the House that after a most careful consideration and long and exhaustive hearings, both on this side of the Capitol and the other side of the Capitol, and after long consideration by the State Department, they had ascertained just exactly how to classify the service. Thereupon the House passed the bill. That was two years ago. I do not know whether conditions have so changed throughout the world as to make necessary these proposed changes, or whether the committee two years ago was mistaken, but I notice that this bill passes the Senate with Melbourne in class 3, at $5,000. I suppose that was put in there on the recommendation of the State Department, which is consulted about these bills. But as it comes into the House, Melbourne is dropped from class 3 at $5,000 to class 7 at $3,000; and other changes of that sort are made here. I should like to inquire of the gentleman whether this bill meets with the full approval of the State Department, or whether they make recommendations along the lines now proposed.

Mr. COUSINS. Concerning Melbourne, I will say to the gentleman that it is proposed to have the principal office at Sydney, where the chief business is done, therefore leaving no necessity for an office of the $5,000 class at Melbourne.

Mr. MANN. And was that conclusion reached by the State Department since this bill passed the Senate?

Mr. COUSINS. Oh, no; we have had this proposition in the House ever since January, and have received no additional advice from the State Department as to Melbourne, Gibraltar, or Limoges, the three amendments that were put in by the Senate. They were not included in the letter of transmittal from the State Department, and it is not thought by the Committee that these amendments should now obtain.

Mr. MANN. Then the bill reported by the House, as I understand it, conforms with the recommendations of the State Department.

Mr. COUSINS. It is identical.

Mr. MANN. And the items inserted in the Senate in the way they were did not conform with the recommendations of the State Department.

Mr. COUSINS. I do not know what anyone in the State Department may have said to any member of that body.

Mr. MANN. But I mean the written recommendations.

Mr. COUSINS. No, not with the recommendations to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. MANN. Of course we understand that sometimes certain consuls have friendly relations with gentlemen who have influence on legislation at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Is that desirable?

Mr. MANN. Sometimes desirable, not always. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for the readjustment of the consular service. By the bill twenty-eight useless consulates are closed, seventeen new offices are established where they are much needed, seven offices are transferred to other places, thirteen consulates are changed in grade, and eleven offices are increased in salary, altogether at an actual saving of $1,000 a year to the Government. The gentleman from Illinois expresses surprise that now, after the lapse of two years, we are again attempting to reorganize the consular service. If the gentleman will investigate the question a little further, I think he will find that it will probably be some years yet before we have our consular service on a par with the consular service of some other countries. A great deal of reorganization is still necessary.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, I opposed the bill two years ago because it did not reorganize the consular service and put it upon the merit system, but I do not see any difference between this bill and that bill in that respect.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the gentleman's criticism is well founded, and I should like to see a more thorough reorganization of the consular service myself. I have introduced two bills at this session, which are before our committee, providing for the appointment of a commission to sit here in Washington and examine this subject. There are several other bills before the Congress for that purpose, but in a way, speaking for myself, I am satisfied that this bill now before the House affords so much progress that I am glad to support it and lend it all the aid that I can. It does accomplish a considerable improvement in the consular service. Let me tell you in a brief way in just what respects the consular service, in my opinion, needs reorganization.

In the first place, the test of the importance of a consulate should be the amount of business done there. The salary should be proportionate to that, and all other considerations should be subordinated. Our consular service, as at present constituted, is sadly out of joint in these respects. For example, here is a table of promotions.

Suppose a man is appointed consul at Rheims, France, in class 8. His salary is $2,500. The fees collected at that office were $4,481, and the business done in that consular district, in 1905, which is the last year for which we have specific figures, was $6,030,000. This man, we will assume, has done well in the profession and he is promoted to class 7. He gets a consulate at Nantes, also in France, at a salary of $3,000. The fees collected there are $531, and the business amounts to $250,000. Suppose this man again gets a promotion, and this time he goes to class 6 at Lucerne. There he gets a salary of $3,500, and the fees collected are $645, and the business done in 1905 was $76,000.

Now, in a way this shows how unequal and ridiculous the present working of the consular system is. In a certain sense it may be considered to be nobody's fault; it is the growth of our foreign trade which is unequal in different countries, and we are subjected as time goes on to new situations. This bill makes some attempt to remedy these inequalities. The table of promotions which I have just discussed has been rearranged. Our bill raises the salary of the consul at Rheims to $3,500, and entirely abolishes the useless consulate at Lucerne. There is no doubt that a great many consulates are perfectly unnecessary, places where there is no longer any need of a consulate, and other places where there is nowadays great need for the establishment of new consular offices.

This bill takes up the recommendations of a former consul of the United States, Mr. J. Martin Miller, who resigned his post at Rheims last year after very efficient service, and who, on his return to America, made a very lucid and interesting statement of the needs of the consular service, which have been practically recognized in this bill before us. I am glad to see that the Department of State has accepted his recommendations and made the report which assisted the Senate in the preparation of this bill.

Let me show you now our consular situation in two European countries. Here is Saxony, a constituent part of the German Empire. At the present day there are eight consulates in Saxony, and in Switzerland six. Saxony is one-eighth the size of Pennsylvania, and in that little country there are eight consulates. In Switzerland, which is a little bit larger, there are six consulates. This bill cuts out four of the consulates in Saxony—Annaberg, Eibenstock, Glauchau, and Zittau—and it takes out one—Lucerne—in Switzerland.

In former times it was necessary for a foreign merchant who desired to import goods from a foreign country into the United States to appear before the United States consul in person and take oath as to the value of the goods he was to import. An Executive order on the 1st of last June rendered this no longer necessary. Now in any foreign country a foreign merchant desiring to export goods to the United States may send his invoice by letter or by messenger to the United States consul, and that is considered as a satisfactory appearance before him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does not the law now provide that the exporter shall appear in person before the United States consul?

Mr. HARRISON. That was the interpretation of the law before the 1st of last June.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not the law now, but has been superseded by an Executive order.

Mr. HARRISON. It has been superseded by an Executive order, which is being followed by our consuls throughout all the countries. The result is to dispense with the necessity of more than one consulate in any small country. This bill does not go far enough. What is the use of leaving four consulates in Saxony when one will do? What is the use of leaving five in Switzerland when one will do?

A debate arose in the Committee on Foreign Affairs as to the consul at Lucerne. This post has been stricken out by the bill, but the Secretary of State in testifying before the Committee on Foreign Affairs said that this consulate and some others like it were necessary, because there were so many American tourists over there; that the consulate did practically no business, but it was necessary to be obliging and considerate and helpful to the American tourists.

Well, if that were to be the rule, we might as well have a consul posted like a policeman at every street corner in Paris and London, because there are American tourists in difficulties everywhere; but it is not intended that the consular system of this country shall be used for the purpose of helping out American tourists who want to know the address of the nearest place to get stockings or hats. The consular service is solely for the purpose of the promotion of the business interests of the United States and has nothing to do with social affairs.

The consuls of the United States, under the so-called "improvement of the consular system," are supposed to be blazing the trail of American manufacturers. In my humble opinion they have very little to do with blazing such a trail. American business firms who contemplate exporting to foreign countries do not consult our consuls in the well settled and established countries, but send their own agents over there to promote their own trade.

In fact, I think they are apt very often to avoid the American consulates, because of the fact that many of them have vice-consuls who are foreigners, who pry into our trade secrets and use them to the disadvantage of the American business man. Therefore, it is something of a humbug to say that consuls are blazing a trail for American business men, although I think that much good is being accomplished by our system of daily consular reports. The consuls are mere invoicing machines in many countries, but we are obliged to have an invoicing machine in every country, and therefore we have to have one consulate there. But we are not obliged under the new Executive order to have more than one consulate in each one of these countries. Let us take once more the case of Switzerland. Imports into the United States from Switzerland last year were nearly twenty-seven million of dollars. Exports from the United States to Switzerland were $612,000. It does not look as if those six consuls were blazing much of a trail for American commerce. What they are doing is to invoice for Swiss merchants who have goods sent to the United States.

There is another matter touched on in this bill which should be brought to the consideration of the House, and that is the question of the consuls-general. As the term now exists, the consul-general does not mean anything. He is a sort of grand panjandrum, with a little round button on top of his head, but for all practical intents and purposes his title means nothing. In each country we should have only one consul-general, who ought to be dignified with that title and occupy a position superior to the other consuls. In China we have about twelve consulates, and six of them are consuls-general. In Germany we have something like seven consuls-general. The Secretary of State in explaining this matter said that in some of the petty courts of the small German States, like Munich, it was advisable to have a consul-general, because he could more readily gain access to the court and could secure presentation for American citizens. That seems to me to be about as sensible, considering the present historical situation of the German Empire, as for foreign nations to have consuls-general at Albany and Harrisburg to secure introductions for foreigners to the governors of New York and Pennsylvania.

In my opinion the consular service should be so reorganized that only one consul-general should be in each country, and that one consul-general should have the supervision over the others. The commercial capital of each country should be the seat of our consul-general. However, this is not a matter to get excited about. If all these men want to wear feathers in their hats, let them wear them; but I think that more good could be accomplished in the service by reorganization along these lines.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the gentleman to yield me five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I had occasion when the legislative appropriation bill was before the House to call attention of the committee at that time to a conflict of authority in the three Departments of this Government dealing with the development of our business interests abroad. The Department of Commerce and Labor has special agents abroad; the Treasury Department has special inspectors traveling in foreign countries; the State Department has five consuls-general at large, inspectors of the consular service, traveling all over the world, and rendering excellent service. They ought to have ten or fifteen. Just think what one of these men has to do. The consul-general at large who is at work in the continent of Europe to-day is obliged to inspect every consulate in Europe once every two years. For that purpose this leaves time enough for three days to each consulate, so that, on an average, he has to do all his traveling and his inspection of each consulate in Europe in only three days. The traveling alone is enough to exhaust any man. It is largely due to the work of these consuls-general at large that recommendations have been made for the abolition of the twenty-eight useless consulates which we wipe out by this bill. Therefore, I think that they are more than earning their salt. But, Mr. Speaker, these three Departments of our Government, the State, the Treasury, and Commerce and Labor should not be asking us for three separate appropriations for agents abroad. Consolidation of these various officials should be effected, both in the interests of economy and of efficiency.

Now, just one more point, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest a reorganization of the consular service, so that those who go into the service should be appointed not to specific posts, but to grades. This would not interfere with the Senatorial prerogatives of appointment, but would make it possible to send individuals to the posts for which they were personally fitted. It would also render possible a service based strictly upon merit, where patronage would play a less conspicuous part. New appointees should first take a course of instruction in the State Department, in the Department of Commerce and Labor, or in the Department of the Treasury. Men who are to be consuls should have the benefit of such instruction in our own country. They should then go abroad as vice-consuls, thereby displacing all foreigners who now hold those positions, and in the course of time they should become full-fledged consuls. They would thereby have the practical training in the Departments at home; they would have served their apprenticeship as vice-consuls before they were called upon to handle the great questions that may appear at any moment before a consul of the United States, and in the course of time, through merit solely, they would be promoted as consuls and eventually perhaps as consuls-general.

This would do away, moreover, with one of the worst features of our present system. I refer to the vice-consular evil. To-day the vice-consul belongs to either one of two classes: (1) A clerk in the office who is probably not good enough to be a consul, or (2) a merchant in the place where he is serving. In the latter event he is usually a native of the country where we employ him or a naturalized American citizen who has returned to the country of his birth to stay for good. He has secured appointment as vice-consul usually for the social prestige it gives him and works without salary. Under this system he can hardly be expected to serve our country as faithfully or efficiently as an American citizen, and too often he uses his position to discover American trade secrets and use them for his own benefit or that of his own fellow-countrymen.

Now, these suggestions are made, of course, not with the expectation that they will be acted upon by the House at this time, but since we are reorganizing the consular service we should do it with an eye to future possibilities of improvement. What we are doing to-day is an earnest of hope for the future, and I believe in a very short time the American consular system will rank with the American business intelligence as the most perfect and the most efficient in the civilized world. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to point out the fact that if the State Department had properly investigated the offices to be changed or abolished before the House passed the bill two years ago, this bill would probably be unnecessary. It is true that the Secretary of State says that the changes that have occured in the last year and a half have made this legislation necessary. Yet I desire to call the attention of the House to three places, and they are selected at random, mentioned in the report which show that the changes have not taken place during the past year and a half; but the conditions existed when the bill two years ago was passed, as they exist now.

In Alexandretta, in Syria, "the work is inconsiderable," the Department says, "and the opportunities for advancing American trade from this place are small. As the business of the district is not done there," much could be accomplished by moving the office to another place. At Port Rowan, Ontario, the salary is $2,000 a year. Last year the office collected but $266, and the cost of maintaining the office was $2,199. At Utila, Honduras, the salary is $2,000, and there was collected last year $190. The Department says that there is no opportunity for consular work other than of a purely routine character, and no chance for the furtherance of American trade and interest. My opinion, Mr. Speaker, is that the Secretary of State in his letter gives the reasons why it is possible at this time, perhaps, to secure favorable action on this bill. He states:

I may add also that the changes suggested are not made with any intention or desire to legislate out of office any of the incumbents of the consulates listed for closing. The office recommended herein, together with several existing vacancies, will make it possible to transfer these officers to other posts and in many cases, where the records of the officers justify that course, to promote them to more important and higher grade offices.

In other words, everybody now in the service can be taken care of even if this bill be passed. I suppose one feature of the bill that should commend itself to the House is the fact that there is a saving of $1,000 a year in the amount of salaries paid. But, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the statement made by my colleague from New York [Mr. HARRISON] that the President by Executive order has superseded four sections of the Revised Statutes covering what is required of persons exporting from other countries to this country, and so that there might be no question whatever that the Revised Statutes require persons signing invoices to appear in person before United States consuls or consuls-general——

Mr. HARRISON. It is an interpretation of the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not, because section 1715 says:

No consular officer shall certify any invoice unless he is satisfied that the person making the oath thereto was the person he represents himself to be, that he is a creditable person, and that the statements made under such oath are true; and he shall thereupon, by his certificate, state that he was so satisfied.

In view of the statement that the President has issued an order that the person so signing these certificates shall not appear before the consuls, I shall ask permission to insert the three sections of the Revised Statutes that cover this point, so that it can be made apparent that the President has usurped power by declaring by Executive order that it shall be unnecessary to do what the statutes of the country require.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statutes referred to are as follows:

SEC. 2853. All invoices of merchandise imported from any foreign country shall be made in triplicate, and signed by the person owning or shipping such merchandise, if the same has actually been purchased, or by the manufacturer or owner thereof, if the same has been procured otherwise than by purchase, or by the duly authorized agent of such purchaser, manufacturer, or owner.

SEC. 2854. All such invoices shall, at or before the shipment of the merchandise, be produced to the consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent of the United States nearest the place of shipment, for the use of the United States, and shall have indorsed thereon, when so produced, a declaration signed by the purchaser, manufacturer, owner, or agent, setting forth that the invoice is in all respects true; that it contains, if the merchandise mentioned therein is subject to ad valorem duty, and was obtained by purchase, a true and full statement of the time when and the place where the same was purchased, and the actual cost thereof, and of all charges thereon; and that no discounts, bounties, or drawbacks are contained in the invoice but such as have actually been allowed thereon; and when obtained in any other manner than by purchase, the actual market value thereof at the time and place when and where the same was procured or manufactured; and, if subject to specific duty, the actual quantity thereof; and that no different invoice of the merchandise, mentioned in the invoice so produced, has been or will be furnished to anyone. If the merchandise was actually purchased, the declaration shall also contain a statement that the currency in which such invoice is made out is the currency which was actually paid for the merchandise by the purchaser.

SEC. 2855. The person so producing such invoice shall at the same time declare to such consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent the port in the United States at which it is intended to make entry of merchandise; whereupon the consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent shall indorse upon each of the triplicates a certificate, under his hand and official seal, stating that the invoice has been produced to him, with the date of such production, and the name of the person by whom the same was produced, and the port in the United States at which it shall be the declared intention to make entry of the merchandise therein mentioned. The consul, vice-consul, or commercial agent shall then deliver to the person producing the same, one of the triplicates, to be used in making entry of the merchandise; shall file another in his office, to be there carefully preserved; and shall, as soon as practicable, transmit the remaining one to the collector of the port of the United States at which it shall be declared to be the intention to make entry of the merchandise.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken and (in the opinion of the Chair) two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, acting under the instruction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 1424) with the House committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, with the amendments reported by the commitee.

The Clerk will report the bill as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1424) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the approval of this act the Medical Department of the United States Army shall consist of a Medical Corps and a Medical Reserve Corps, as hereinafter provided; and the Hospital Corps, the nurse corps, and dental surgeons, as now authorized by law.

SEC. 2. That the Medical Corps shall consist of one Surgeon-General, with rank of brigadier-general, who shall be chief of the Medical Department; 14 colonels, 20 lieutenant-colonels, 100 majors, and 300 captains or first lieutenants, who shall have rank, pay, and allowances of officers of corresponding grades in the cavalry arm of the service. Immediately following the approval of this act all officers of the Medi- loss of relative rank in the Army, as follows: Assistant surgeons-general, shall be recommissioned in the corresponding grades in the Medical Corps established by this act in the order of their seniority and without loss of relative rank in the Army, as follows: Assistant surgeons-general, with the rank of colonel, as colonels; deputy surgeons-general, with rank of lieutenant-colonel, as lieutenant-colonels; surgeons, with the rank of major, as majors; assistant surgeons, who at the time of the approval of this act shall have served three years or more, as captains; and assistant surgeons, with the rank of first lieutenant, who at the time of the approval of this act shall have served less than three years as such, as first lieutenants; and hereafter first lieutenants shall be promoted to the grade of captain after three years' service in the Medical Corps.

SEC. 3. That promotions in the Medical Corps to fill vacancies in the several grades created or caused by this act, or hereafter occurring, shall be made according to seniority, but all such promotions and all appointments to the grade of first lieutenant in said corps shall be subject to examination as hereinafter provided: Provided, That the increase in grades of colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major provided for in this act shall be filled by promotion each calendar year of not exceeding two lieutenant-colonels to be colonels, three majors to be lieutenant-colonels, fourteen captains to be majors, and of the increase in the grade of first lieutenant not more than 25 per cent of the total of such increase shall be appointed in any one calendar year: Provided further, That those assistant surgeons who at the time of the approval of this act shall have attained their captaincy by reason of service in the volunteer forces under the provisions of the act of February 2, 1901, section 18, or who will receive their captaincy upon the approval of this act by virtue of such service, shall take rank among the officers in or subsequently promoted to that grade, according to date of entrance into the Medical Department of the Army as commissioned officers.

SEC. 4. That no person shall receive an appointment as first lieutenant in the Medical Corps unless he shall have been examined and approved by an Army medical board consisting of not less than three officers of the Medical Corps, designated by the Secretary of War.

SEC. 5. That no officer of the Medical Corps below the rank of lieutenant-colonel shall be promoted therein until he shall have successfully passed an examination before an Army medical board consisting of not less than three officers of the Medical Corps, to be designated by the Secretary of War, such examination to be prescribed by the Secretary of War and to be held at such time anterior to the accruing of the right to promotion as may be for the best interests of the service: Provided, That should any officer of the Medical Corps fail in his physical examination and be found incapacitated for service by reason of physical disability contracted in the line of duty, he shall be retired with the rank to which his seniority entitled him to be promoted; but if he should be found disqualified for promotion for any other reason, a second examination shall not be allowed, but the Secretary of War shall appoint a board of review to consist of three officers of the Medical Corps superior in rank to the officer examined, none of whom shall have served as a member of the board which examined him. If the unfavorable finding of the examining board is concurred in by the board of review, the officer reported disqualified for promotion shall, if a first lieutenant or captain, be honorably discharged from the service with one year's pay; and, if a major, shall be debarred from promotion and the officer next in rank found qualified shall be promoted to the vacancy. If the action of the examining board be disapproved by the board of review, the officer shall be considered qualified and shall be promoted.

SEC. 6. That nothing in this act shall be construed to legislate out of the service any officer now in the Medical Department of the Army, nor to affect the relative rank or promotion of any medical officer now in the service, or who may hereafter be appointed therein, as determined by the date of his appointment or commission, except as herein otherwise provided in section 3.

SEC. 7. That for the purpose of securing a reserve corps of medical officers available for military service, the President of the United States is authorized to issue commissions as first lieutenants therein to such graduates of reputable schools of medicine, citizens of the United States, as shall from time to time, upon examination to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, be found physically, mentally, and morally qualified to hold such commissions, the persons so commissioned to constitute and be known as the Medical Reserve Corps. The commissions so given shall confer upon the holders all the authority, rights, and privileges of commissioned officers of the like grade in the Medical Corps of the United States Army, except promotions, but only when called into active duty, as hereinafter provided, and during the period of such active duty. Officers of the Medical Reserve Corps shall have rank in said corps according to date of their commissions therein, and when employed on active duty, as hereinafter provided, shall rank next below all other officers of like grade in the United States Army: Provided, That contract surgeons now in the military service who receive the favorable recommendation of the Surgeon-General of the Army shall be eligible for appointment in said reserve corps without further examination: Provided further, That any contract surgeon not over 29 years of age at date of his appointment as contract surgeon shall be eligible to appointment in the regular corps.

SEC. 8. That in emergencies the Secretary of War may order officers of the Medical Reserve Corps to active duty in the service of the United States in such numbers as the public interests may require, and may relieve them from such duty when their services are no longer necessary: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing an officer of the Medical Reserve Corps to be ordered upon active duty as herein provided who is unwilling to accept such service, nor to prohibit an officer of the Medical Reserve Corps not designated for active duty from service with the militia, or with the volunteer troops of the United States, or in the service of the United States in any other capacity, but when so serving with the militia or with volunteer troops, or when employed in the service of the United States in any other capacity, an officer of the Medical Reserve Corps shall not be subject to call for duty under the terms of this section: And provided further, That the President is authorized to honorably discharge from the Medical Reserve Corps any officer thereof whose services are no longer required: And provided further, That officers of the Medical Reserve Corps who apply for appointment in the Medical Corps of the Army may, upon the recommendation of the Surgeon-General, be placed on active duty by the Secretary of War and ordered to the Army Medical School for instruction and further examination to determine their fitness for commission in the Medical Corps: And provided further, That any officer of the Medical Reserve Corps who is subject to call and who shall be ordered upon active duty as herein provided and who shall be unwilling and refuse to accept such service shall forfeit his commission.

SEC. 9. That officers of the Medical Reserve Corps when called upon active duty in the service of the United States, as provided in section 8 of this act, shall be subject to the laws, regulations, and orders for the government of the Regular Army, and during the period of such service shall be entitled to the pay and allowances of first lieutenants of the Medical Corps with increase for length of service now allowed by law, said increase to be computed only for time of active duty: Provided, That no officer of the Medical Reserve Corps shall be entitled to retirement or retirement pay, nor shall he be entitled to pension except for physical disability incurred in the line of duty while in active duty: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the appointment in time of war of medical officers of volunteers in such numbers and with such rank and pay as may be provided by law.

SEC. 10. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, this bill is entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the United States Army." It proposes to do three things toward that end. In the first place, it gives a somewhat better flow of promotion than exists in the corps at present. It does this by increasing the number of officers of the higher grades in greater proportion than it does those of the lower grades. When the reorganization of the Army took place in 1901, an unintentional injustice was done to the Medical Corps of the Army. The same flow of promotion was not permitted there as existed in every other staff corps in the Army. Scarcely had that bill become a law when the effect became apparent. Officers, seeing that there was little chance of promotion in front of them, began to resign, and the resignations since the reorganization bill became a law have increased very largely over what they were previous to the passage of that law.

That is not the worst of it, because the men who resigned were the very best men in the corps. They were the class of men that is was most essential to retain. There was another thing about it. The Medical Corps in the Navy was so organized that there was a much better flow of promotion there, and there was a much better opportunity for promotion in that service than in the similar service of the Army. The result of it was that the Navy got all, or most, of the best men. The Army had to compete first with the Navy to get the kind of men it needed in the Medical Corps, and then, of course, it had to compete to some extent with the inducements of civil life. The result of that has been that the Medical Corps instead of improving as it ought to have improved has either stood still or gone backward.

Now, in order that the nation and the private soldier may receive the benefit of the increased inducements we have given here for a man to join the Medical Corps, and remain in it in better service, we have provided that examination upon promotion shall be carried clear up to the grade of lieutenant-colonel, so that the unfit may be eliminated. And I know it is the policy of the Medical Department to make these examinations more severe and exacting than they have ever been in the past. It is proposed, therefore, to give a better flow of promotion, so that better men may enter the Army, and then to see to it that the country gets the benefit of this better class of men. Then the other thing that the bill does of importance is to substitute for the present contract surgeons a reserve corps, into which men may go who are not in the Army upon passing an examination. They shall then be eligible to appointment in the Army upon passing another examination. It is believed that in this way interest can be created among the medical profession of the country to the peculiar advantage of the medical profession in the Army, and wherever you have these men upon the reserve corps little centers of influence will be created.

Now, the trouble in getting good service in the Army is not in obtaining good doctors. You may take from civil life physicians who can give medicine and diagnose a case just exactly as well as an officer of the Medical Corps of the Army. The difficulty is in finding men with the necessary knowledge of Army sanitation and of Army hygiene. The Army lives under such different conditions from those of men in civil life that where we have taken physicians from civil life and placed them in important positions in the Army the Medical Corps has almost always broken down. The service has broken down because of the want of knowledge of these men. They may be expert in their profession as to what is needed to preserve health, but they have not had experience in the Army. We had a conspicuous instance in the camp at Chickamauga during the Spanish-American war. You all know that a medical officer was in command there than whom perhaps no man stood higher in the medical profession of this country.

Yet, sir, the conduct of that camp in its sanitation could hardly have been worse. It was a disgrace to the American Army; it was a disgrace to the American nation. Many men died there whose lives ought to have been preserved. How much time have I used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DAVIDSON). The gentleman has twelve minutes remaining.

Mr. YOUNG. I will merely say that this bill increases to some extent the expense of the Medical Department. When it is in full operation it will increase that expense about $80,000 a year; but I believe it will actually be much cheaper for the people, because they will get much better service than under present conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I was in hope that the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] would be able to give a more full explanation of the bill, but I recognize the difficulties under which a gentleman labors when he calls up a bill like this for passage under suspension of the rules. This bill proposes to make the Medical Corps of the Army more top-heavy than any proposition that has every been offered up to date. It is proposed, with an Army now of less than 50,000 men——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. When it is recruited up, it will be 63,000 men.

Mr. MANN. And with a possible Army of how many men——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. A possible Army of 100,000 men.

Mr. MANN. With a possible Army of less than a hundred thousand men it is proposed to have 450 surgeons in the Army.

When the Committee on Appropriations last November was having a hearing in Panama, Colonel Gorgas, an Army officer detailed to the Canal Zone, made a comparison between the number of medical officers upon the Canal Zone and the number in the Army.

The Canal Zone is an unhealthy place. It requires a far higher degree of attention to secure good sanitation than do the Army headquarters in the United States. Colonel Gorgas testified that with a population which they serve, about equal to the Army of the United States, or more than the present Army, their entire medical corps was less than 100, and their efficiency is far greater than the efficiency in the Medical Corps of the Army has been. Yet here is a proposition to put into the Army 450 medical officers, 150 of whom will never have anything to do with the patients or the ill men in the Army; 150 men of high rank. It is a proposition merely to create 150 officers of high rank in order to have nice comfortable berths to which to promote men. Those are not the men who give medical attention. They are not the ones who wait upon the sick or take care of the men in time of war in the field. They are the places created above, to cause, as it is said, an incentive to men to come into the Army.

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House—both sides of the House—we have a great many propositions like this now pending before the House, a number of which have been reported. This is not the only bill of this character reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. Other bills of like character are reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs. The other day we passed in this body a bill to increase the pay of enlisted men in the Army. But if this bill now before us becomes a law, it is inevitable that the House will give the same degree of attention to the officers of the line in the Army that this gives to the officers of the medical staff, and we shall be forced to pass a bill which will give these other officers greater pay or greater chances for promotion.

Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MANN. With pleasure.

Mr. YOUNG. Is not the gentleman aware that even with this change in the law there will be less chance of promotion in the Medical Corps than in any corps of the Army?

Mr. MANN. I do not so understand it. On the contrary, I am assured by officers of the line in the Army that this bill is notoriously unfair to them, and that if this bill goes through they will have the right to demand that they shall have increased pay or increased opportunities for promotion.

Mr. YOUNG. Then I wish to say to the gentleman that his information is absolutely misleading.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. I have always noticed that whenever any bill came before the House or before the committee, the men who were especially interested in that bill were active in pointing out why that bill should pass and some other bill should not pass; but I repeat what I have said, that I have been informed by officers of the line in the Army that the Medical Corps now have a better chance for promotion than the line officers; that promotion comes faster in the Medical Corps than it does in the line, and that if this bill passes they will ask, as they believe they have a right to demand, that other promotions shall be provided for them.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Is it not true that in all the staff corps of the Army promotion is better than in the line, in the permanent staff corps?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Michigan said it was not true about the medical staff, and now the chairman of the committee says it is true. That sustains my position. I think it is true.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman is wrong in another proposition, that in the permanent staff corps it is better than the line, and always has been. In the Judge-Advocate's there is nobody starts there below major; and in the Inspector-General's nobody starts in below the grade of major. The same has been true in the Adjutant-General's corps. And yet the line does not start there. These men in the Medical Corps start below that grade.

Mr. MANN. These men start as first lieutenants.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Take the Engineer Corps, they have a better promotion than the Medical Corps; so has the Judge-Advocate, and this largely equalizes the flow of promotions.

Mr. MANN. I do not know about that. This bill provides far greater promotions and more rapid promotions for the medical staff than now exists in the line. Not only that, it provides a far greater promotion of high officers than is provided for the line.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That may be true.

Mr. MANN. It is true; the gentleman has not made the figures. There are under this bill 300 first lieutenants and captains, and there are half that number of majors and those having the rank of major. That is not true of the line of the Army. This bill proposes to give to the Medical Corps of the Army far greater advantage in the way of promotion and salaries than is given to the line. As far as I am concerned, I would always rather give promotion to the men who fight in the Army than to the men who talk and do staff duty.

Mr. YOUNG. Would not the gentleman like to give them a little protection from disease?

Mr. MANN. I would, but the 150 officers provided for in this bill who have the rank of captain will have mighty little to do with protection against disease. They are provided only to create places to promote to; they do not issue the medical prescriptions; they do not attend the patients in the Army; they do not do medical work; they are provided only for the purpose of having berths for other people to be promoted to.

Mr. PAYNE. And to make an easier flow of promotion.

Mr. MANN. That is exactly it. The whole object of it is the greater flow of people to the retired list. There is not a contract surgeon now who does not hope to get into the Army under this bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There can not one get in under it unless he was under 29 years of age when he went in, and then he could only be commissioned a first lieutenant.

Mr. MANN. I will make an exception; there may be a few contract surgeons who do not expect to get in, but there are mighty few. The bill is drawn for the purpose of putting the contract surgeons into the Army, so as to put them on the retired list.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, no; oh, no.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may say "Oh, no." I have examined the report and a large amount of literature that has been circulated in reference to it, and I have had, like the gentleman from Iowa and other gentlemen, letters from interested people on this bill which has been introduced. All the letters are from all the military hospitals in the country, and the patients in those military hospitals have been urged to write letters to Members of Congress in favor of this bill. They were written at the instance of medical officers, who ought to be attending to the patients, endeavoring to get them well. A greater lobby for a bill has not been seen around Washington for many years than has been in favor of this bill. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY.]

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I could not attempt to speak on this bill in three minutes.

Mr. YOUNG. I yield five minutes.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I have a great admiration for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I think he does most excellent work in this House, but the speech he has just made demonstrates that it is impossible for him to know everything about every bill that comes up in the House. No one man can consider all the different bills that are reported from the different committees of this House and give fair consideration to those bills, and while the gentleman from Illinois is a great worker and does great good in the House, he has just demonstrated that he is ignorant in large measure of what he is talking about on the bill which is now being considered by the House. I am surprised that the gentleman from Illinois should cast a fling at the Medical Corps of the Army when he says that he wants to appropriate money for the men who fight.

That is a nice way to oppose a bill of this character. I venture to say that the medical profession has sacrificed more in lives and more fortunes than any other profession in this country for the benefit of the Army. I venture to say that they have shown themselves martyrs. I could recall, if I had the time, many men in the Medical Corps of the Army, notably that surgeon, Walter Reed, who gave his life that he might discover the way to properly treat yellow fever. These men never spare their lives on the firing line. In every battle of the great civil war men on both sides, Union and Confederate surgeons, were always found on the firing line. I have no time to go into details of this bill, but I say that this bill has been very carefully considered by the entire profession of the country, that it has the approval of that profession, that it has the approval of the Secretary of War and the approval of the President of the United States, that it has the approval of the Senate of the United States, that it has been considered by the Committee on Military Affairs in three separate Congresses and has been reported favorably each time, and I say that it is not for the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in a short speech, in a space of ten minutes' time, to defeat its passage.

It certainly is beyond even his province to put forward arguments here against a measure which is intended for the benefit of the service of the Army of the United States, almost quite as much as it is intended for the Medical Corps itself. I want to call the attention of every Member of this House to the fact that the Ordnance Corps, the Engineer Corps, the Artillery Corps, have all been, since the Army organization act of 1901, increased in just this way—under a motion to suspend the rules. So I say, Mr. Speaker, that every reason demands the favorable consideration in this House of this bill, and I hope that the Members of the House will vote for a bill so meritorious in its terms and which has for its purposes the benefit of the American Army now and the American Army in the future if, unfortunately, we should have to go to war.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Can the gentleman state to what extent this bill will increase the compensation of the Medical Corps of the Army?

Mr. HAY. About $40,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the House that when the Committee on Military Affairs had up the question of the reorganization of the Army in 1901 a majority of the committee insisted then that the Medical Corps was being discriminated against, and that it would be impossible to secure the right kind of young men in that corps unless they were given equal promotion with the other staff corps of the Army. At that time the Secretary of War insisted that we were mistaken. In less than a year after that time the Department admitted the Medical Corps should have better promotion. From that time to this we have tried to give a little promotion in order to induce the best class of young men to enter the Medical Corps. As it stands to-day the Navy doctor gets promoted from a lieutenant to a captain after three years' service; the Army after five years' service. That has caused Army surgeons to resign and enter the Navy within the last few years. We have a shortage in the Medical Corps to-day, because there are not sufficient inducements to enter that corps. We have to-day about 200 contract surgeons in the Army scattered all over the country. This bill abolishes the contract surgeons at $1,800 a year and puts in the first lieutenants at $1,500, so that there is a saving on that 200 of $300 each per year in the beginning. This is not an extravagant measure. The bill gives a flow of promotion, and I will state to my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] unless you do, you will never have your Medical Corps of the Army organized on the lines that will give the most effective service. This flow of promotions is not beyond the other staff corps. The gentleman is right when he says that it is a greater flow of promotion than the line, because they enter this as first lieutenants and in three years they are made captains, but from captain up they have to serve quite a long time before they get an additional promotion.

It is true that they get more rapid promotion, especially in the lower grades, but it is not as rapid promotion as has been given to other staff corps of the Army, and unless you do it and you should have another war you will suffer as we did before by not having the trained care of doctors understanding Army hygiene to care for the raw recruits when they are put into camp.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the gentleman explain why it is that it is proposed to put contract surgeons upon the Army roll?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is not proposed unless they comply with the conditions. If a contract surgeon entered the Army before he is 29 years of age, which is the limit now, he can get into the Medical Corps, and if he has served ten years in there and passes his examination he is a better man to go into the lower grade and start up than any new man can possibly be, because he has had his ten years of training. An objection that one member of the Military Committee has to this bill is that it was not changed to provide the contract surgeon should be the nursery for the Medical Corps of the Army.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand this bill is for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Medical Corps?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And yet there seems to be a clause here providing for the retirement of contract surgeons.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not unless they entered the Army young enough and have given service enough so that they can be in the regular corps. It does not deal with the retirement of a contract surgeon as a contract surgeon. It only deals with him if he is commissioned in the Regular Army.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Supposing that a contract surgeon, having served ten years in the Army and having entered before 29 years of age, he is eligible to appointment——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. As first lieutenant.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Although he may expect to retire within six months?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If he entered when he was 29 and served until he was 64, in my judgment you could not do an act of greater justice than to retire a contract surgeon who served that length of time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How many contract surgeons are there?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. One hundred and eighty-nine.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And of that number many have been employed as contract surgeons for a great many years?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No, sir. There is one that has been a contract surgeon for thirty-three years. I think there are not over eight or nine who have served over fifteen years.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I thought this was partly for the purpose of stuffing the retired list.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not at all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it adds a great many in the end, as the gentlemen both know, to the retired list. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], paying me a left-handed compliment, which I appreciate, said that I was ignorant of the provisions of this bill. Undoubtedly I think most everybody in the House is ignorant of most of the provisions of the bill, but, at least, I was not ignorant of one of the essential features of the bill, concerning which the gentleman must himself plead ignorance, because he was asked what would be the net increase of cost by this bill, and he replied $40,000 per annum.

Mr. HAY. I did not say that. I said $40,000 in the first year.

Mr. MANN. And on this occasion he must have been dealing in his vivid imagination. Why, the gentleman would not pretend, when asked a question as to how much this would increase the cost of the Army, the Medical Corps, to say what the increase would be merely the first year.

Mr. HAY. That is what I understood the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to ask, and that is what I answered.

Mr. TAWNEY. I did not limit it to any year.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] did not mean that.

Mr. HAY. That is what I thought he meant.

Mr. MANN. The report itself does not indicate what it will cost. The report says for the year 1910 it will cost $80,000 more, but that will carry a large number of first lieutenants, all of whom in a short time, if they remain in the service, will have their salaries increased.

Mr. Speaker, we are met with a situation. We are going into a campaign. This side of the House will be charged with extravagance by the other side of the House. Times are hard. Hundreds of thousands of men in the country are out of work. Physicians and surgeons themselves will soon be suffering, if they are not now suffering.

I wonder whether this side of the House proposes to keep on increasing salaries and the retired list of the various branches of the Government; I wonder whether, if they do, that side of the House will be in a position where it can complain of the attitude of this side of the House. The charge will be made many times during the coming campaign that the Republicans control in Congress and in the Executive Office and have been grossly extravagant. But I notice that most propositions for what seems to me gross extravagance, as this one is, usually receive practically unanimous support from the Democratic side of the House. And I am going to watch with interest the rest of these bills as they come up to see whether gentlemen on the Democratic side, who always talk economy, will always vote for extravagant bills like this.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Michigan has five minutes remaining.

Mr. YOUNG. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I regard this as one of the most important bills in the way of general legislation pending in the Congress of the United States. We are in a period of civilization where we are trying to build up something for humanity through medical science, and if we are going to discourage the medical branch of our Army we are going to do the worst possible thing, and we will do much to break down the great advancement in sanitation which we have entered upon and in which we have accomplished so much. The Medical Corps, under great embarrassments, have accomplished more in the last ten years in sanitation methods and discoveries in the United States than any other class of people in it, or than has been accomplished in any other country in all the ages past. It has done more to do away with hospitals and to keep people out of them in this country, by providing for sanitation, than any country in the world has ever done. The Army needs and deserves a compact, well-organized corps of medical officers. In my opinion this bill is fraught with great good for humanity and for the Army. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has made a charge that this bill is top-heavy; that its only purpose was to give soft places to some of the favorites of the Department or of the committee. I wish to say——

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not make any such statement as that, that would reflect on the committee.

Mr. YOUNG. I withdraw that part of it if the gentleman does not want that inference drawn, although I think that was the only inference that could be drawn from the words he used. I wish to say that if the gentleman from Illinois is willing to take the responsibility—if he can influence this House—of leaving the Medical Corps of the Army in the condition that it is now in, I do not envy him that responsibility. Everyone who has studied this question at all knows that the losses from disease in the Army in time of war are very much greater than the losses from wounds. We have had it demonstrated in the war between Russia and Japan that such losses from disease are unnecessary.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WEEKS. I understand this provides for 450 surgeons. How many are now in the Army—50,000?

Mr. YOUNG. Sixty-two thousand.

Mr. WEEKS. That is about seven surgeons to a regiment, is it not? Did you ever hear of a regiment that had seven surgeons?

Mr. YOUNG. These men are stationed at a number of posts. I have not time to go over the details of where these men will be stationed, but we are providing not only for the present, but for a nucleus for time of war. We know what a condition existed at the beginning of the Spanish war. Men died by hundreds who ought to have lived, and had they had adequate sanitary provision they would have lived. In the civil war the conditions were much worse; and I say, for one, I am not willing to take any part of the responsibility of perpetuating this condition any longer.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the motion and passing the bill with amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that, in his opinion, two-thirds had voted in favor thereof.

Mr. MANN. Let us have a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 126, noes 15.

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

PROTECTION OF GAME IN ALASKA.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, with amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14789) to amend an act entitled "An act for the protection of game in Alaska, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1902.

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act for the protection of game in Alaska, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1902, be amended to read as follows:

"From and after the passage of this act the wanton destruction of wild game animals or wild birds, except eagles, ravens, and cormorants, the destruction of nests and eggs of such birds, or the killing of any wild birds, other than game birds, except eagles, for the purposes of selling the same or the skins or any part thereof, except as hereinafter provided, is hereby prohibited.

"Game defined: The term 'game animals' shall include deer, moose, caribou, mountain sheep, mountain goats, brown bear, sea lions, and walrus. The term 'game birds' shall include waterfowl, commonly known as ducks, geese, brant, and swans; shore birds, commonly known as plover, snipe, and curlew, and the several species of grouse and ptarmigan.

"Exemptions: Nothing in this act shall affect any law now in force in Alaska relating to the fur seal, sea otter, or any fur-bearing animal or prevent the killing of any game animal or bird for food or clothing at any time by natives, or by miners or explorers, when in need of food; but the game animals or birds so killed during close season shall not be shipped or sold.

"SEC. 2. Season: That it shall be unlawful for any person in Alaska to kill any wild game animals or birds, except during the season hereinafter provided: North of latitude 62 degrees, brown bear may be killed at any time; moose, caribou, sheep, walrus, and sea lions from August 1 to December 10, both inclusive; south of latitude 62 degrees, moose, caribou, and mountain sheep from August 20 to December 31, both inclusive; brown bear from October 1 to July 1, both inclusive; deer and mountain goats from April 1 to February 1, both inclusive; grouse, ptarmigan, shore birds, and waterfowl from September 1 to March 1, both inclusive: Provided, That no caribou shall be killed on the Kenai Peninsula before August 20, 1912: And provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it necessary for the preservation of game animals or birds, to make and publish rules and regulations prohibiting the sale of any game in any locality modifying the close seasons hereinbefore established, providing different close seasons for different parts of Alaska, placing further restrictions and limitations on the killing of such animals or birds in any given locality, or prohibiting killing entirely for a period not exceeding two years in such locality.

"SEC. 3. Number: That it shall be unlawful for any person to kill any female or yearling moose or for any one person to kill in any one year more than the number specified of each of the following animals: Two moose, one walrus or sea lion, three caribou, three mountain sheep, three brown bear, or to kill or have in his possession in any one day more than twenty-five grouse or ptarmigan or twenty-five shore birds or waterfowl.

"Guns and boats: That it shall be unlawful for any person at any time to hunt with dogs any of the game animals specified in this act; to use a shotgun larger than No. 10 gauge, or any gun other than that which can be fired from the shoulder; or to use steam launches or any boats other than those propelled by oars or paddles in the pursuit of game animals or birds.

"SEC. 4. Sale: That it shall be unlawful for any person or persons at any time to sell or offer for sale any hides, skins, or heads of any game animals or game birds in Alaska, or to sell, offer for sale, or purchase, or offer to purchase, any game animals or game birds, or parts thereof, during the time when the killing of such animals or birds is prohibited: Provided, That it shall be lawful for dealers having in possession game animals or game birds legally killed during the open season to dispose of the same within fifteen days after the close of said season.

"SEC. 5. Licenses: That it shall be unlawful for any nonresident of Alaska to hunt any of the game animals protected by this act, except deer and goats, without first obtaining a hunting license, or to hunt on the Kenai Peninsula without a registered guide, and such license shall not be transferable and shall be valid only during the calendar year in which issued. Each applicant shall pay a fee of $100 for such license, unless he be a citizen of the United States, in which case he shall pay a fee of $50. Each license shall be accompanied by coupons authorizing the shipment of two moose if killed north of latitude 62°, four deer, three caribou, three mountain sheep, three goats, and three brown bear, or any part of said animals, but no more of any one kind.

"A resident of Alaska desiring to export heads or trophies of any of the game animals mentioned in this act shall first obtain a shipping license, for which he shall pay a fee of $40, permitting the shipment of heads or trophies of one moose, if killed north of latitude 62°, four deer, two caribou, two sheep, two goats, and two brown bear, but no more of any one kind; or a shipping license, for which he shall pay a fee of $10, permitting the shipment of a single head or trophy of caribou or sheep; or a shipping license, for which he shall pay a fee of $5, permitting the shipment of a single head or trophy of any goat, deer, or brown bear. Any person wishing to ship moose killed south of latitude 62° must first obtain a special shipping license, for which he shall pay a fee of $150, permitting the shipment of one moose or any part thereof. Not more than one general license and two special moose licenses shall be issued to any one person in one year: Provided, That before any trophy shall be shipped from Alaska under the provisions of this act the person desiring to make such shipment shall first make and file with the customs office at the port where such shipment is to be made an affidavit to the effect that he has not violated any of the provisions of this act; that the trophy which he desires to ship has not been bought or purchased and has not been sold and is not being shipped for the purpose of being sold, and that he is the owner of the trophy which he desires to ship, and if the trophy is that of moose, whether the animal from which it was taken was killed north or south of latitude 62°: Provided further, That any resident of Alaska prior to September 1, 1908, may without permit or license ship any head or trophy of any of the game animals herein mentioned upon filing an affidavit with the customs office at the port where such shipment is to be made that the animal from which said head or trophy was taken was killed prior to the passage of this act. Any affidavit required by the provisions of this act may be subscribed and sworn to before any customs officer or before any officer competent to administer an oath.

"The governor of Alaska is hereby authorized to issue licenses for hunting and shipping big game. On issuing a license he shall require the applicant to state whether the heads or trophies to be obtained or shipped under said license will pass through the ports of entry at Seattle, Wash., Portland, Oreg., or San Francisco, Cal., and he shall forthwith notify the collector of customs at the proper port of entry as to the name of the holder of the license and the name and address of the consignee. All proceeds from licenses, except $1 from each fee, which shall be retained by the clerk issuing the license to cover the cost of printing and issue, shall be paid into a game-protection fund and shall be expended under the direction of the governor for the employment of wardens or the payment of other expenses for the protection of game in Alaska. And the governor shall annually make a detailed and itemized report to the Secretary of Agriculture, in which he shall state the number and kind of licenses issued, the money received, and how the same was expended, which report shall also include a full statement of all trophies exported and all animals and birds exported for any purpose.

"And the governor of Alaska is further authorized to employ game wardens, to make regulations for the registration and employment of guides, and fix the rates for licensing guides and rates of compensation for guiding. Every person applying for a guide license shall, at the time of making such application, make and file with the person issuing such license an affidavit to the effect that he will obey all the conditions of this act and of the regulations thereunder, that he will not violate any of the game laws or regulations of Alaska, and that he will report all violations of such laws and regulations that come to his knowledge. Any American citizen or native of Alaska, of good character, upon compliance with the requirements of this act, shall be entitled to a guide license. Any guide who shall fail or refuse to report any violation of this act, or who shall himself violate any of the provisions of this act, shall have his license revoked, and in addition shall be liable to the penalty provided in section 7 of this act, and shall be ineligible to act as guide for a period of five years from the date of conviction.

"SEC. 6. That it shall be unlawful for any persons, firm, or corporation, or their officers or agents, to deliver to any common carrier, or for the owner, agent, or master of any vessel, or for any other person, to receive for shipment or have in possession with intent to ship out of Alaska, any wild birds, except eagles, or parts thereof, or any heads, hides, or carcasses of brown bear, caribou, deer, moose, mountain sheep, or mountain goats, or parts thereof, unless said heads, hides, or carcasses are accompanied by the required license or coupon and by a copy of the affidavit required by section 5 of this act: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent the collection of specimens for scientific purposes, the capture or shipment of live animals and birds for exhibition or propagation, or the export from Alaska of specimens under permit from the Secretary of Agriculture, and under such restrictions and limitations as he may prescribe and publish.

"It shall be the duty of the collector of customs at Seattle, Portland, and San Francisco to keep strict account of all consignments of game animals received from Alaska, and no consignment of game shall be entered until due notice thereof has been received from the governor of Alaska or the Secretary of Agriculture, and found to agree with the name and address on the shipment. In case consignments arrive without licenses they shall be detained for sixty days, and if a license be not then produced said consignment shall be forfeited to the United States and shall be delivered by the collector of customs to the United States marshal of the district for such disposition as the court may direct.

"SEC. 7. Penalties: That any person violating any of the provisions of this act or any of the regulations promulgated thereunder by the Secretary of Agriculture or the governor of Alaska shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall forfeit to the United States all game or birds in his possession, and all guns, traps, nets, or boats used in killing or capturing said game or birds, and shall be punished for each offense by a fine of not more than $200 or imprisonment not more than three months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. Any person making any false or untrue statements in any affidavit required by this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall forfeit to the United States all trophies in his possession, and shall be punished by a fine in any sum not more than $200 or imprisonment not more than three months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

"Enforcement: It is hereby made the duty of all marshals and deputy marshals, collectors or deputy collectors of customs, all officers of revenue cutters, and all game wardens to assist in the enforcement of this act. Any marshal, deputy marshal, or warden in or out of Alaska may arrest without warrant any person found violating any of the provisions of this act or any of the regulations herein provided, and may seize any game, birds, or hides, and any traps, nets, guns, boats, or other paraphernalia used in the capture of such game or birds and found in the possession of said person in or out of Alaska, and any collector or deputy collector of customs, or warden, or licensed guide, or any person authorized in writing by a marshal shall have the power above provided to arrest persons found violating this act or said regulations and seize said property without warrant to keep and deliver the same to a marshal or a deputy marshal. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon request of the governor or Secretary of Agriculture, to aid in carrying out the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 8. That all acts or parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

With the following amendments:

Strike out lines 1, 2, 3, 4 and the words "of game in Alaska" in line 5, on page 7, and insert the following: "clerk issuing the license to cover the cost of printing and issue, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts; the amount necessary for the enforcement of this act shall be estimated for annually by the Agricultural Department and appropriated for, including the employment and salaries to be paid to game wardens herein authorized."

Also, strike out the words "and how the same was expended," in line 8, page 7.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. HIGGINS. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HIGGINS] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Speaker, this bill amends the present game law of Alaska, which was passed in 1902. That law has been found to be very defective. Under it there has been no adequate protection of game and no diminution in the slaughter which has been going on. Under this bill a practical method is established for enforcing the law, for a report must be made to the Secretary of Agriculture as to the number of men who are employed as game wardens, the amount and kind of game that is killed, and a limit is placed upon the amount of game and the season in which that game may be killed.

So far as the seasons are concerned, this bill does not materially differ from the present law, and those seasons were agreed upon by the committee and reported upon in this bill upon the judgment of Doctor Merriam, Chief of the Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture, than whom, I suppose, nobody has better information concerning the game in Alaska. The bill has been carefully considered and is unanimously reported by the Committee on Territories and, in our judgment, is an important measure to secure protection for the game in the greatest game preserve there is to-day on this continent, a matter in which, I am sure, we are all interested.

The revenue from the licenses will, in my judgment, be sufficient to more than carry out the provisions of this bill; but if not, the amendment offered makes it obligatory upon Congress to make the appropriation upon estimates furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not imagine that I shall at all oppose this bill. I am quite interested in the subject. I have not had an opportunity of reading the bill in advance, and I asked for a second in order that I might have a full explanation. With the permission of the gentleman, I should like to ask him several questions in regard to the bill.

Mr. HIGGINS. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Glancing over the bill hastily, as I have, I could not fully grasp its provisions.

Mr. HIGGINS. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] introduced the bill, and he has been in Alaska and may be able to answer the questions more specifically than I can.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I will ask the gentleman from Washington, with his consent.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. In the bill that was introduced last year, which did not become a law, there was a provision, as I remember, which seemed to be very objectionable, and which I think is not found in this bill. I think in that bill there was no attempt to impose any restrictions upon the natives. I do not find that provision in this bill, and I ask whether any such exception has been made.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will say to the gentleman that there is no such provision in this bill. One of the reasons why I left it out was because of the knowledge I obtained last spring when I visited Alaska and was hunting there for about two months. I became thoroughly convinced that the game needed protection from the Indians, and that the Indians needed that protection for their own benefit. In other words, I found that the Indians were killing a great deal of game out of season, simply for the love of slaughter, and not using the game. Then when the time came when they needed it they found the game was very scarce. That is the reason there is no such provision in the bill now.

Mr. PERKINS. I am glad to have the gentleman's statement, because I suggested to the gentleman from Washington last year that the bill was deficient and that the greatest slaughterers of game to their own detriment were the Indians themselves. I am glad that the personal observation of my friend from Washington agrees with that view. I think that is the most important thing in the bill.

Now, I want to ask another question: This bill is general in its terms and restricts the amount of game that may be slaughtered by any one, whether he lives in Alaska or this country?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; with one exception. The bill does provide that miners and prospectors may kill game for food. They will do it anyway, and no one wants to prohibit them.

Mr. PERKINS. In respect to the license, I do not exactly understand the provisions of the bill. Suppose an American not living in Alaska goes there and obtains his license upon the payment of $50, that allows him to kill a certain number of animals that are specified in the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. What portion of the animals can he export under that license, or must he have a separate license to take out any animals from that country?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. He can bring out any except the heads of moose which are killed on the Kenai Peninsula.

Mr. PERKINS. By obtaining a $50 license he can bring out the head of a moose killed in the country except on the Kenai Peninsula.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; except on the Kenai Peninsula.

Mr. PERKINS. And on that Kenai Peninsula nobody can kill moose until the year 1912?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; no one can kill caribou until 1912, but they can kill moose; but they have to have a special license in order to bring out the head of a moose from there.

Mr. PERKINS. The provision as to close time until 1912 refers only to caribou?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; and the reason of that is that there is a different variety of caribou on the Kenai Peninsula; they are almost extinct, and they want to stop the killing for a number of years.

Mr. PERKINS. In order for a person outside of Alaska to kill a moose on the Kenai Peninsula and bring out a head, he would have to take out a license of $50 and then a special license of $150.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. Making a license in all of $200. But he could bring out the head of a mountain sheep or the head of a moose killed elsewhere for $50?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. Does not the gentleman think that a license of $200 for a moose killed on the Kenai Peninsula is too high?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will tell the gentleman why that is done. The large moose is found only on the Kenai Peninsula, and it is quite a limited territory. If the gentleman will look on the map he will see that this peninsula is only about 100 miles square and deeply indented by various bays, so that you can get in by water very easily. And in addition to that they are building a railroad through the center of the peninsula, so that within a few years you can ride right into this great game country on the train. The great moose live only on this peninsula, and unless there are very strict laws in regard to it they will soon be exterminated. This moose is attracting sportsmen from all over the world. For that reason I think the law ought to be strict. One of the large heads of these moose will often bring $1,000.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman knows that in New Brunswick, where they have large moose, you can get a license for $50.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If the gentleman should go north of latitude 62, he can bring out under his general license the head of a moose. But there is no comparison between the moose on the Kenai Peninsula and those in New Brunswick.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the bill anywhere restrict the killing of the female game?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. What female?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. You can not kill the female moose, but you can shoot the female caribou.

Mr. PERKINS. What is the reason of that?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The reason of that is that both males and females of the caribou have horns, and the hunter can not tell the male from the female.

Mr. PERKINS. He is not much of a hunter who can not tell the difference.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It takes a pretty good hunter unless you get close to them. Perhaps the gentleman gets closer to his game than the ordinary sportsman.

Mr. PERKINS. I get just as close as I can, always.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, just an inquiry. Is there anything in the provisions of this bill that prevents a miner or a prospector or a native Indian of Alaska from killing game at any time for his food and maintenance?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; it is specially provided in the bill that they may. There is a special provision in the bill to that effect—to kill it for food.

Mr. PERKINS. Can any resident kill it for food at any time?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; not any resident, but any miner, prospector, or native.

Mr. PERKINS. I did not understand the gentleman to say that any Indian could kill game at any time of the year for food?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SULZER. And he ought to have the right to do it.

Mr. PERKINS. The result is that very soon he will not have any food.

Mr. SULZER. Not at all. The Indians of Alaska would have ample food for hundreds of years to come if it were not for the white man coming in and killing the game.

Mr. PERKINS. My friend is not as familiar with the game situation as he is with other situations.

Mr. SULZER. I am very familiar with the game situation in Alaska. I have been there about a dozen times, and I have studied the conditions existing. I know what I am talking about.

Mr. PERKINS. I imagine the Indians up there are like the Indians in Wyoming.

Mr. SULZER. They are entirely different. Quite a different race.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope so.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will read that provision in the bill. It says:

> Nothing in this act shall affect any law now in force in Alaska relating to the fur seal, sea otter, or any fur-bearing animal to prevent the killing of any game animal or bird for food or clothing at any time by natives and miners or explorers when in need of food; but the game animals or birds so killed during close season shall not be shipped or sold.

I think that ought to be in there.

Mr. SULZER. Yes; and I am glad that provision is in there. Now, is there anything in this bill that prevents the people of Alaska from killing eagles and shipping the eagles out?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No.

Mr. SULZER. I am glad of that, because the eagles in Alaska are too numerous and many ought to be killed. They are very destructive. They destroy the young game birds and animals.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They can be killed under this bill, and it is the only bird that can be, without restriction.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say further that though there is some question about the details of this bill, I want to express my approval of the bill, because it seems to me that the administration in reference to Alaska and its game has not been characterized by any very high degree of wisdom. Last autumn I was very desirous to go and spend a little money for the benefit of Americans in Alaska in hunting there. The provisions imposed by the Department were such, in refusing to allow anyone to bring out trophies of any sort, that any American sportsman, instead of spending his money where he would prefer, in his own country, was obliged to go to Canada and spend what little money he had to spend among Canadians, for the benefit of Canadian guides. This seemed to me a very injudicious attempt to protect American labor engaged in this branch of business which, while not very important, is still useful. I congratulate the gentleman in producing a bill under which a sportsman can spend his money in his own country, and not in Canada.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE].

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, the general provisions of this bill are undoubtedly wise and proper. I do not profess to know anything about what the game laws should be in Alaska, and I am entirely willing to take the judgment of the Committee on Territories upon that proposition. But there are some provisions of this bill that I do most strenuously object to. In carrying out a good purpose it does not seem to me to be necessary that we should violate all of our preconceived ideas of what should constitute crime under the law. Under the provisions of this bill—and I am advised by the gentleman who presents it under the law as it exists to-day—it is possible to make a crime out of a violation of a regulation either by the governor of Alaska or the Secretary of Agriculture. If such a regulation is violated, under the provisions of this bill a United States marshal or deputy anywhere in the United States may without warrant arrest the violator, and the punishment is not only forfeiture of whatever game he may have in his possession but he may be sent to the penitentiary for a period of three months and fined a large sum of money.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BONYNGE. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you know whether or not it is a fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that a man can not be tried and convicted for the violation of a regulation established or fixed by the head of the Department in pursuance of law?

Mr. BONYNGE. There was a case recently decided by the Supreme Court, and there seems to be some difference as to the proper interpretation to be placed on that opinion. There are those who contend that the court held that a violation of any regulation could not constitute a criminal offense. There are others who contend that if the regulation was made in pursuance of statute and in pursuance of the general provisions of law, that the violation of such a regulation might constitute a criminal offense. I have not personally examined the opinion, but whether we have the power to make such a law or not does not matter. Such a law is fundamentally wrong. This bill gives to the Secretary of Agriculture or to the governor of Alaska the right to make regulations with all the force of law, and to change them at his or their will. Consequently, what to-day may not constitute a crime may to-morrow constitute one, and by the violation of any such regulation you are permitting, by the terms of this bill, the marshal or a deputy marshal to arrest a man anywhere in the United States without a warrant.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BONYNGE. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Does it not seem to the gentleman that perhaps his criticism is not just, because it says in section 7, "Any person violating any of the provisions of this act or any of the regulations promulgated thereunder?" Would it not necessarily be a regulation authorized by this act?

Mr. BONYNGE. Certainly; but I do not care whether it is authorized by the act or not, if the gentleman please. Here you are providing that the governor of Alaska or the Secretary of Agriculture may make regulations at will and change them as they see fit, making closed seasons in one portion of Alaska and open seasons in another portion of Alaska, changing those sections from time to time, just as the whim or the caprice of the Secretary of Agriculture or the governor of Alaska may prompt them to do; and for the violation of any such regulation, made either by the Secretary of Agriculture or the governor of Alaska, the man may be arrested anywhere in the United States without a warrant.

Now, no matter, gentlemen, how good the other provisions of this bill may be, how necessary they may be for the protection of game in Alaska, I submit to you that the rights of American citizens and the laws as they have come down to us ought not to be violated in regard to the personal liberty of citizens in this careless manner, even to protect the game of Alaska. There is something more involved in the passage of this bill with such provisions in it than the mere protection of game in Alaska. And if it be true that the law as it now stands contains such provisions as these, this is a good opportunity for us to say to the committee, that as you want to change the other provisions of the law regulating the killing of game in Alaska, see to it also that you change this vicious provision of the bill, and bring in a bill that not only protects the game in Alaska, but in doing so will not violate all of our ideas of what constitutes proper law for the protection of the liberty of citizens.

For the reasons I have suggested, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill in this form, and I trust that it may be defeated at this time, that it may go back to the committee and have this correction made before passing the House. [Applause.]

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in the gentleman's argument, and it would have come with better force if it was not that the present law has the same provision as that to which he refers. The existing law is not changed at all with respect to the criticism which the gentleman makes, and no good purpose can be served in defeating this bill for the reason that the gentleman so eloquently gives. The nature of the matter herein legislated upon rather compels that the governor and the Secretary of Agriculture, who have the enforcement of this law, should have the power to make regulations.

I will now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, just a word in relation to what the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] has said. I think that the gentleman has grown eloquent over the liberty of the citizen quite unnecessarily. This has been the provision of the law for a good many years, and I have not heard of anybody being outraged yet by it. I have not heard of any citizen that has been prosecuted for the violation of this rule, and the fact about it is I do not believe that that section of the bill—and I never have believed—that it could be enforced. This legislation is greatly needed. All bills are in a certain sense a compromise, and I had to accept some of these things that I never was in favor of in order to get it passed. I attempted to get it through last session and it failed. And I want to say a word or two in connection with that provision providing for arrests "in or out of Alaska." It is not a new provision. There are many instances where men have gone to Alaska and brought the heads into some port and then had a vessel to bring them out. They come to Seattle, Tacoma, or San Francisco with these trophies. There is no way to reach those people unless you give some power to arrest them outside of Alaska. This is also to reach the taxidermists of Tacoma, Seattle, and San Francisco. They are the greatest offenders against the game laws. They hire Indians and natives—anyone they can get to secure these game trophies for them. They get them in in some manner. This part of the bill ought not to be stricken out. It should stay in order to reach these men. The law is already in this shape and contains that provision.

The Secretary of Agriculture wants that section relative to regulations. If the Secretary of Agriculture should change the closed season for the Kenai Peninsula for a period of two years, which is as long as he can make the change for, the men who go there and violate that provision ought to be prosecuted. They will have an opportunity to find it out about such change. It will be promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. How are the people to know what the law is? Will they have to hunt up the governor and find it out from him or the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They would have to get a license, and when the man applies for a license he undoubtedly would be informed.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. He would be informed as to the regulation that was first announced; but suppose the governor or Secretary changed his regulation after the man gets the license?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is not reasonable to suppose that in the short hunting season—it is only a few weeks—he would promulgate a new order after issuing the license. I do not believe that any governor of Alaska would do anything of the kind, or that any reasonable man would.

Mr. OLLIE M. JAMES. You tell us the reasons for incorporating this provision of the law which you say can not be carried into effect is because the Secretary of Agriculture wants it. Have you got no better reason than that the Secretary of Agriculture wants to make it to offer the House for its adoption?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. One reason I said was because the Secretary of Agriculture wanted it in, and Doctor Merriam thought it ought to be in there; and if it can be enforced it ought to be. I do not believe, however, that a man can ever be punished criminally for a violation of a rule issued by a governor or the Secretary of Agriculture. But I do ask that the bill pass, inasmuch as it in no way changes the present law, in order to get it over to the Senate. One of the greatest necessities is to protect the natives in Alaska, as well as the game. In the southeastern part of Alaska the natives are being rapidly exterminated. I found out on my last visit last year that it was produced largely by starvation. During the winter time the natives of southeastern Alaska are not able to get sufficient food, and one of the reasons is the game is being rapidly exterminated. I went there and saw this condition, and I came back resolved to do everything possible to get a bill through to protect not only the game, but primarily to protect the natives by protecting the game. For that reason, above all others, I hope the House will pass this bill and let it go over into the Senate, and if there is anything so obnoxious or vicious as some of them seem to think, perhaps the Senate committee will strike out that particular part.

Mr. BONYNGE. The gentleman from New York has two minutes, if he will yield it to me.

Mr. PERKINS. If I have any more time, I will yield the gentleman two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield it to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, the last argument of the gentleman from Washington has prompted me again to ask for more time. The gentleman says we ought to pass this bill containing a provision which he admits can not be enforced, which he says ought not to be in the law, and the only reason he says we ought to pass it is to send it over to the Senate and let the Senate do the legislating for us. The character of this measure——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, I did not say that was the only reason.

Mr. BONYNGE. The only reason you urged.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I did not say that at all. I said that was one reason. I said it was a bad law, and I would not put it in the law if I could help it.

Mr. PERKINS. You recognized it as the law now.

Mr. BONYNGE. I understand it is the law now, and that it probably passed under unanimous consent, when no attention was given, perhaps, to this provision in the bill. But now, when attention is called to it, it is the duty of the House to determine whether or not it will deliberately enact a law containing those provisions. The question is whether or not this House approves of legislation of that character. What does the gentleman say as to the reason why he accepts this provision, which even he says does not meet with his approval? It is that the Secretary of Agriculture asks that this provision be in the bill. Has it come to the point that this House is going to adopt legislation which upon the floor of the House Members say they do not believe can be enforced, which they admit they do not think ought to be in the law, simply because some member of the executive department has asked that it be in the law? [Applause.] I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that this House wants to go upon record in favor of that proposition. Stop and think for one moment just what this law permits.

The governor of Alaska, an appointee of the President, not an elective officer, is authorized by the provisions of this bill to make laws, is authorized to determine what are crimes, and a citizen of the United States violating an edict of the governor of Alaska may be arrested anywhere in the United States without a warrant; and the question is further presented now to the Members of the House whether they approve of such a law as that. The game of Alaska can be protected without such a provision, and I hope it will be. [Applause.]

Mr. HIGGINS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize what the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] has said regarding the necessity for the enactment of some legislation for the protection of the game in Alaska, and especially the necessity of amending existing law for the benefit of the natives.

The Indians of southeastern Alaska have been self-supporting ever since the Government of the United States purchased that district; but by reason of legislation enacted by Congress much of their employment has been taken away from them, and even the opportunity of supplying themselves with the necessaries of life, in so far as these necessaries are furnished by the game of Alaska, has been to a large extent taken away from them. The conditions as described by the gentleman from Washington have not been overdrawn in the least, as I can state from my own personal knowledge.

The objection raised by the gentleman from Colorado, if it was an original proposition, would be entirely valid. I do not believe that the Congress of the United States should delegate to any administrative officer, I care not who he may be, the power to enact criminal legislation; but, Mr. Speaker, the provision against which the gentleman from Colorado is complaining is the law now, and that same provision is not only in the law governing the killing of game, or controlling and regulating the killing of game in Alaska, but that provision abounds in a great many statutes enacted by Congress.

My information is that the Supreme Court of the United States has held provisions of this kind to be merely nugatory; that they can not be enforced, for the reason that the Congress of the United States can not delegate to any administrative office the power of enacting criminal laws in the form of regulations. Therefore we are not changing any existing law by this provision, and if this bill does not pass that provision of which the gentleman complains will remain in the law and continue to be the law until some other legislation is enacted.

But in view of the existing law, in view of the fact that this provision is nugatory in any event, I do not think we ought to hesitate longer to enact wise legislation for the benefit especially of the natives of southeastern Alaska, who are starving, or on the verge of starvation, in consequence of their not being able to kill the game that roams through their forests of that great district.

Mr. PAYNE. Why not strike out this objectionable clause by unanimous consent?

Mr. TAWNEY. I would be willing to do that.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish the gentleman from Washington would suggest that. I should like to have a vote on the bill, but I will not vote for any such provision as that.

Mr. TAWNEY. I would suggest to the gentleman to strike out all after the word "act," in line 11, down to and including the word Alaska," in line 13, page 9. I do not think that the gentleman from Connecticut or the gentleman from Washington ought to hesitate to do that, because it will improve the bill and insure its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut may modify his motion by an amendment striking out the lines indicated. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 9, lines 11, 12, and 13, strike out the following words: "or any of the regulations promulgated thereunder by the Secretary of Agriculture or the governor of Alaska."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have not the floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The bill provides that the governor of Alaska shall issue the licenses. Why do you take it away from Secretary Wilson? The governor is away a great deal of time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is proposed that the governor's clerk can issue it. The governor has charge of this fund, and he looks after it and turns it in to the Secretary of Agriculture. I think it is better for the governor of Alaska to issue it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the law say that his clerk may issue it in the absence of the governor?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; it says the governor shall do it; but I presume he will have a clerk to do it.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HIGGINS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. I understand it is moved to strike out language that makes reference to language on page 8.

Mr. TAWNEY. No; on page 9, from line 11 down to and including the word "Alaska," in line 13, "or any regulations promulgated thereunder by the Secretary of Agriculture or the governor of Alaska."

Mr. KENNEDY of Ohio. The only provision for regulation appears on page 8, where authority is granted the Secretary of Agriculture, as I understand it, to suspend these rules in the interest of collectors.

Mr. HIGGINS. I will say to the gentleman that it also provides that regulations may be made for restricting the employment of guides and fixing the rates of license, and there are other regulations aside from the license the gentleman refers to.

Mr. CUSHMAN. There is no objection to regulations being made if the violation of them is not made a crime or misdemeanor.

Mr. TAWNEY. These regulations can be enforced by withholding the license.

Mr. PERKINS. The regulations are mentioned on page 3, beginning at line 2.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill with the amendment.

The question was taken, and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill as amended was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. R. 40. Joint resolution to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 17277. An act for the relief of George S. Patten, of Williams, Coconino County, Ariz.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. R. 40. Joint resolution to provide for the transportation by sea of material and equipment for use in the construction of the Panama Canal—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

CUTTING TIMBER ON THE MENOMINEE INDIAN RESERVATION IN WISCONSIN.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 4046) to authorize the cutting of timber, the manufacture and sale of lumber, and the preservation of the forests on the Menominee Indian Reservation in the State of Wisconsin, with amendments.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe in executing the intent and purposes of this act, to cause to be cut and manufactured into lumber the dead and down timber, and such fully matured and ripened green timber as the forestry service shall designate, upon the Menominee Indian Reservation in the State of Wisconsin.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, as soon as practicable, cause to be built, equipped, and operated suitable sawmills, equipment, and necessary buildings for manufacturing into lumber the timber cut under the provisions of this act, and there shall be employed such skilled foresters, superintendents, foremen, cruisers, rangers, guards, loggers, scalers, and such other labor, both in the woods and for operating sawmills, equipment, and necessary buildings, as may be necessary in cutting and manufacturing logs and lumber and in the protection of the forests upon said Indian reservation. The Secretary of the Interior in so far as practicable shall at all times employ none but Indians upon said reservation in forest protection, logging, driving, sawing, and manufacturing into lumber for the market such timber, and no contract for logging, driving, sawing timber, or conducting any lumber operations upon said reservation shall hereafter be let, sublet, or assigned to white men, nor shall any timber upon any such reservation be disposed of except under the provisions of this act. Whenever any Indian or Indians shall enter into any contract pursuant to this act, and shall seek by any agency, copartnership agreement, or otherwise to share in the same with any white man, or shall employ in its execution any labor or assistance other than the labor and assistance of Indians, such act or acts shall thereupon terminate such contract, and the same shall be annulled and canceled.

SEC. 3. That the lumber, lath, shingles, poles, posts, bolts, and pulp wood and other marketable materials so manufactured from the timber cut upon said reservation shall be sold to the highest and best bidder for cash, after due advertisement inviting proposals and bids, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. The net proceeds of the sale of such lumber and other material shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the tribe entitled to the same. Such proceeds shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, and the interest shall be used for the benefit of such Indians in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay, out of the funds of the tribe of Indians located upon said reservation, the necessary expenses of the lumber operations herein provided for, including the erection of sawmills, equipment and necessary buildings, logging camps, logging equipment, the building of roads, improvement of streams, and all other necessary expenses, including those for the protection, preservation, and harvest of the forest upon such reservation.

SEC. 5. That when the dead and down timber, and such fully matured and ripened green timber as the Forestry Service shall designate, shall have been converted into lumber, then the Secretary of the Interior is directed to make sale of such portions of the sawmill and manufacturing plant as will not, in his judgment, be needed for continuing operations on this reservation. The terms of these sales shall be fixed by the Secretary, and after the payment of the costs and charges of sale the net proceeds thereof shall be deposited in the same manner and for the same purposes as the net proceeds of the sale of the lumber aforesaid.

SEC. 6. That all acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. MORSE. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, there are several reasons for the passage of this bill. This is a small reservation in northern Wisconsin. There are only ten townships in it. It is composed of 22,680 acres, and no part of this reservation has been allotted. A large part of it is covered with heavy timber. For some years these Indians have been allowed to cut 20,000,000 feet of timber every year and float it down the stream and in that way market it. This timber has been cut back away from the stream. A large part of the pine has been cut. What remains is back a distance from the stream, and a large part of it is very valuable hard wood.

A bill was passed last year providing for the cutting of this timber and the erection of sawmills on the reservation by private individuals. The timber was to be cut at an expense not exceeding $3.50 per thousand feet. The Secretary of the Interior advertised for bids for the building of these sawmills on the reservation, but on account of the fact that there was no guaranty that there would be a continuance of the cutting and on account of the further fact that the price sought was too low, no contract could be let. I neglected to say that about three years ago a cyclone passed through this reservation, blowing down about fifty, or at least many million feet of the finest hard-wood timber in the world.

The Indians, believing that these sawmills were to be built there this coming year, commenced logging this down and dead timber. They have now on the skids there on the reservation piled at three mill sites, where there are no mills, where there is no way of getting it out, about 50,000,000 feet of timber in logs. Now, this bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior may cause to be erected, not with our money, but with the Indians' money, of which they have about two and one-half million dollars in the Treasury, some small sawmills on this reservation, in order that the Indians may cut their own lumber with their own money. The Indians there are governed in their tribal relations by what is known as a business committee, composed, I believe, of seventeen of the most intelligent members of this little tribe.

This tribe, remember, has only some 1,400 people. This business committee is in favor of the passage of this bill, for the reason that the Indians in this way will be able to get all that they can out of their timber, but for the greater reason that they will be given employment. Remember the conditions. This reservation is not allotted. It is not cut over, much of it. There is no farm land that is cleared up on the reservation. There has been no incentive to do any clearing, to build any good buildings, because no one knew, if the reservation was to be allotted, whether or not he would get the particular piece of land on which his house was built. They have absolutely nothing to do during the summer. They have had heretofore work in the winter. Under the provisions of this bill the men who wish to work will be given employment in the summer months as well as the winter months. More than that, the object of all Indian legislation, as I take it, is to educate the Indian toward citizenship, to give him a chance to be able to take care of himself.

That is just exactly what we are attempting to do in this bill. We are attempting to educate these Indians along the line of the preservation of their own forests. You will notice that the timber is to be cut under the supervision of the Forestry Department. Down and dead and matured green timber only are to be cut under the provisions of this bill. No timber is to be cut excepting that which is marked or pointed out by the Forestry Department. It is said that possibly this is a step in a new direction, but you will remember that we are not using the Government's money. We are using the Indians' own money. They have in the Treasury now from this log fund $2,315,000.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us where this timber is?

Mr. MORSE. It is in Wisconsin, on the Menominee Reservation. The timber is hard wood, pine, and hemlock. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SULZER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Have the Indians of this reservation consented to this?

Mr. MORSE. They have, through their business committee.

Mr. SULZER. What compensation does the bill provide that they shall receive?

Mr. MORSE. That is fixed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SULZER. He fixes the compensation, the price that the people shall pay these Indians?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman say how many sawmills there will be necessary?

Mr. MORSE. I will say that it is the intention of the Department to build one fair-sized sawmill and two little portable mills.

Mr. MANN. Can the gentleman say what those will cost?

Mr. MORSE. Not exactly, somewhere from $50,000 to $60,000. That is my estimate.

Mr. MANN. That is for the three?

Mr. MORSE. For the three.

Mr. MANN. What will the large sawmill probably cost?

Mr. MORSE. The estimate that I have received is $50,000 for the large sawmill.

Mr. MANN. Is my understanding correct that this bill proposes that the Government shall build the sawmill and then turn the timber into lumber?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Even the lath and shingles, and all that?

Mr. MORSE. Yes; it is necessary nowadays to do that in order to save the slab. You cut a slab off a log, and that slab is cut up into shingles or laths.

Mr. MANN. This proposes that the Government shall go into the business of manufacturing all kinds of lumber out of timber.

Mr. MORSE. This proposes that the Government shall allow the Indians to go into that business.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman may be correct, but as I read it the Secretary of the Interior was going to do it.

Mr. MORSE. With the Indians' money.

Mr. MANN. Well, that may all be. It is with somebody else's money. I have often heard of people engaging in speculative enterprises with somebody else's money, and sometimes they have more experience than money in the end.

Mr. MORSE. That may be true. I will say to the gentleman that there is a report on file from the superintendent of logging, and he says there is enough down and dead timber to keep two good mills of from 25,000 to 30,000 feet capacity per day in operation almost indefinitely—in other words, for a great many years.

Mr. MANN. Then, why does not the Government advertise this down and dead timber, and somebody build sawmills and make it into lumber instead of the Government going into an industrial enterprise?

Mr. MORSE. This is on the reservation, and they do not want a gang of drunken white men in there corrupting the morals of the Indians, both men and women.

Mr. MANN. Is that the only reason?

Mr. MORSE. That is one of the reasons. Another reason is to educate them and give them a chance to earn their own living—to make citizens of them, in other words.

Mr. MANN. And that therefore the Government shall go into an industrial pursuit?

Mr. MORSE. That therefore the Government shall allow the Indians to go into an industrial enterprise with their own money.

Mr. PAYNE. We have always done that in regard to the Indians?

Mr. MORSE. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to know if I am correct about this. A bill passed the House a year ago, and an amendment was put into the bill putting the pay per thousand so low for sawing that no one could be induced to go out to the reservation and put up sawmills for the purpose of sawing this lumber.

Mr. MORSE. I will say that particular bill originated in the other House. The price set was the price fixed by the superintendent of logging, and it was supposed at the time in all fairness that the price was high enough. But the people did not realize that there was no guaranty that the Government would allow the Indians to keep on cutting this timber.

Therefore we could not get them to build sawmills for one, two, or three years. That is the reason. The price was not high enough. That bill failed. There are 50,000,000 feet of timber, or thereabouts, in the log, lying there now. Now, unless something is done, as soon as the hot sun of summer comes these logs will check or rot and become valueless in a short time.

Mr. PAYNE. And the only question is whether this is the best method of preserving that timber and getting it to market?

Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman who cut the trees down or made these logs, and who are going to saw the logs up? Who felled the trees?

Mr. MORSE. A large number of these were blown down by a cyclone, and the Indians with some white men, who are working with them at this time, have gotten those logs onto skids—piles of logs.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have gotten them where?

Mr. MORSE. Onto skids; piled up into log piles.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who is going to do the sawing?

Mr. MORSE. That is what we are trying to provide now in this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand, but who is going to furnish the mill?

Mr. MORSE. The Secretary of the Interior is to construct a mill with the Indians' money.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is going to be the Indians' mill, then, is it?

Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They are going to own it?
Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir.
Mr. MADDEN. How many acres of land are there in this reservation?
Mr. MORSE. There are exactly 231,680 acres.
Mr. MADDEN. What would be the area of that?
Mr. MORSE. That is the area.
Mr. MADDEN. I mean the number of miles.
Mr. MORSE. There are ten townships.
Mr. MADDEN. That would be practically 60 square miles.
Mr. MORSE. Yes; that is right.
Mr. MADDEN. Sixty square miles. Just a moment. I want to ask how many million feet of timber are there?
Mr. MORSE. The Department has not estimated.
Mr. MADDEN. How do they estimate it will take several years to cut it out?
Mr. MORSE. The superintendent of logging went over the reservation and made a sort of guess at it.
Mr. MADDEN. He does not know anything about it.
Mr. MORSE. Why, no; in a general way. He was a "cruiser."
I hope the gentleman on the other side will use some of his time at this time.
Mr. YOUNG. Will the gentleman permit a question before he yields?
Mr. MORSE. Yes, sir.
Mr. YOUNG. Who is to manage this business—the Government or the Indians?
Mr. MORSE. The management will be under the general supervision of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.
Mr. YOUNG. Then, do I understand that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs takes the Indians' money and builds the mill and runs the logging business, and if it is a failure charges the losses to the Indians and gives the Indians the profits if it is successful?
Mr. MORSE. We are the guardians of the Indian. We are simply giving him a chance in this method to develop in citizenship and education. I reserve the balance of my time.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope this House will not pass too hastily upon this bill. It is of much more importance than Members would think from the explanation given. It may not be known, but the fact is that probably the most valuable timber lands in the United States to-day are owned by the Indians of the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin. Previously there has been permission given to cut part of the timber upon the reservations of the Menominee Indians. These Indians, while their lands have not been allotted, have worked in the past in cutting timber, and have been self-supporting. In 1890 an act was passed authorizing the agent upon this reservation to arrange to permit the Indians to cut a certain amount of timber, but there was a limitation placed upon the amount of timber that could be cut in any one year. The act provided that not to exceed 20,000,000 feet of timber should be logged and sold in any one year. Last year the Congress, upon the representation that there had been a severe wind storm which swept through the reservation, and as a result a large amount of timber was blown down in certain portions of the reservation, passed an act, chapter 3578, which authorized the cutting of the dead and down timber in certain townships in the reservation. It authorized the Secretary of the Interior to permit private individuals to go in and erect portable mills for the purpose of cutting the dead and down timber that was found in these certain townships. The bill that is now before the House is not at all akin to the legislation that has been had previously. This bill as it came from the Senate provided for the cutting of timber without any limitation upon every Indian reservation in the State of Wisconsin—without any limitation whatever, either as to the amount or character, and not limited to the dead and down timber or to the timber that was supposed to be dangerous if it were not taken out.
Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman refer to the bill pending now?
Mr. FITZGERALD. That was the bill that came from the Senate. The committee has changed it so as to make it apply only to the reservation of the Menominee Indians; and it is upon that reservation that most of the valuable timber of all the timber on the Indian reservations in the State of Wisconsin is to be found.
It is a little more frank in its declaration than the bill as it came from the Senate. This bill does what? It repeals the limitation of 20,000,000 feet of timber that may be cut and logged and sold in any year. It permits the cutting, logging, and sale of the dead and down timber not only in those townships upon the reservation through which this great wind storm swept and put down a number of valuable trees, but it permits the sale not only of the dead and down timber but the ripe, green timber in all parts of the reservation. It does more than that. It provides something which has never heretofore been done by Congress. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior not only to erect sawmills but pulp works, and the Members of this House know that they do not make paper pulp out of dead and down timber that is suitable for timber.
Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Where does it say erect pulp mills?
Mr. FITZGERALD. In a moment I will read the gentleman's bill and then he will know what is in it. In section 3, on page 3, it says: "That the lumber, laths, shingles, poles, posts, bolts, and pulp wood."
Mr. MORSE. Pulp wood!
Mr. FITZGERALD. Pulp wood. I am aware of what pulp wood is made. All the young trees that can not be used for logging is usually cut for pulp. All the young trees that can not be cut into logs are cut down and made into pulp wood. It is said to be necessary to take out such trees in order to get at the trees that can be cut into logs.
The provision regarding pulp is an amendment of the House committee. The Senate did not go quite that far. This bill, in my opinion, is one of the most vicious of the many that I have seen affecting the cutting of timber upon Indian reservations. I know, as do other Members of the House who have served on the Committee on Indian Affairs, that the eyes of the lumbermen of this country have been fastened for years upon the timber growing upon the Indian reservations in the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin.
Mr. HACKNEY. Would not your proposition have this turned over to the lumber companies instead of having the Indians do it themselves?
Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not stated my proposition at all. I am just opposing this very vicious proposition.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is not the gentleman mistaken in his statement about the sale of wood pulp? Does it not say pulp wood?
Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.
Mr. MANN. And other marketable materials?
Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman favor the sale of pulp wood that otherwise would be wasted.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I favor the sale of pulp wood. But the legislation that has been had before has been careful to limit the amount of timber that could be cut and sold. In the act of 1900 it was limited to 20,000,000 feet a year. In the act of 1907 it was permitted to cut and log the dead and down timber in the townships that were struck by the cyclone, in addition to the 20,000,000 feet a year; but in this bill there is no restriction whatever, either upon the amount of timber that can be cut and sold, or the townships in which the dead and down timber and the matured, ripe, and green timber can be cut.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the gentleman any objection to the manufacture of the dead and down timber by the Indians?
Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to see the form in which the committee puts the bill.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would the gentleman rather let the timber lie on the ground and rot?
Mr. FITZGERALD. That depends. These Indians have had no trouble in cutting the 20,000,000 feet of timber a year on the reservation, and last year the only reason the law was changed was because in a few townships a great cyclone had swept over the reservation, and it was believed desirable that portable sawmills should be erected there in order to cut and log that timber and take it out, but that is not what is suggested here. It is suggested here to permit the cutting of timber without restriction. The experience of those who have watched these operations has been that once authority is given in that way the land in a short time will be swept clean by the lumbering operations and will be left fit for nothing at all.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.
Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman if there can be any loss in using up the dead and down timber and putting it on the market, for pulp or otherwise, or the matured timber? Is it not a fact that when timber is matured if not used it will degenerate and become worthless?
Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like to hear what the Department says on this bill. In the report it says that the Department favors the bill, but it is a remarkable thing, which rarely happens, that the report of the Department is not quoted.

When the Committee on Indian Affairs report a bill they rarely fail to print the recommendation of the Department upon the bill. Whenever that happens I wish to say——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman is mistaken as to the fact about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not. If I am I have the wrong report.

Mr. HACKNEY. If the gentlemen would look at the Senate report he would know what he was talking about.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not look at the Senate report. I looked at the report made by the House Committee and I was unable to find therein the report made by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can the gentleman tell the House how much of the lumber cut on these reservations is shipped abroad and how much is shipped abroad generally from the United States?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I have no knowledge about that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a tremendous amount, I understand.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman stated that there was no restriction in the bill as to the amount that could be cut. Does not section 1, where it says, "Such fully matured and ripened green timber as the Forestry Service shall designate," limit and restrict the amount?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no limitation. The act of 1890 provides that not more than 20,000,000 feet shall be cut, logged, and sold in any one year. I am unable to say whether there is information that would make it necessary that more should be cut.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If there was 40,000,000 feet, would you let 20,000,000 feet be destroyed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows too much about lumber to claim that if the timber were standing it would be destroyed, or, even if it were down, unless it were down for a considerable time. The dead and down timber, as a result of the cyclone, has been down nearly four years now. Nobody seems to be worrying that that will be destroyed. Everybody knows that it will not be destroyed. This is one of the places where prime timber is found, and I hope the House will not show any unusual haste in passing bills of this character unless the explanation is more satisfactory than the report shows. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MORSE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HACKNEY].

Mr. HACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to hear my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] criticise this bill the way he does. There can only be one of two things in his mind; if his ideas are followed out you either turn this timber over to the lumber companies, or you sit supinely by while the timber rots. That was the matter put before the committee and considered by the Indian Commissioner, and had the gentleman from New York been fair he would have looked at the Senate report and found a letter from the Secretary of the Interior——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will pardon me, I said that the report of the committee said that, while the Department favored the bill, the Department's report was not printed with the committee's report. The Members of the House should not be expected to look at reports of the Senate to find out what the House thinks of the bill.

Mr. HACKNEY. The gentleman made the statement only to reflect on the Indian Affairs Committee, and for no other purpose, because when I started to hand the gentleman the report he said he didn't want to see it. The fact of the matter is, this proposition comes here as a business proposition. Are we to allow the timber to rot? Are we to let the lumber companies go in and devastate these forests, or are we to take hold of it in a business way and take down the timber and such matured timber as shall be designated by the Forestry Service and manufacture and take care of it?

I was on the subcommittee that investigated this matter. I know that this is a good proposition. They have done good work in the past, and under the contract system, under the limitation that the gentleman speaks of; but the existing law is inadequate to meet the conditions confronting us. They have the down timber there now, and that must rot unless we allow the Government to take hold of it in a business way. Again, the Indian Commissioner wants to put these Indians to work instead of having the white men come in and do the work; he wants the Indians to have something to do. This matter has been handled in a business way and will be handled in a business way, and I say that is shown by the fact that they have over $2,000,000 to the credit of these Indians from sales of logs that might have been wasted in the past. The forests are in good condition and they will not be devastated if the plan of this bill is adopted, for in section 1 it is provided that they are to cut only such matured green timber as the Forestry Service may designate.

Mr. MORSE. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON].

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, just a word. This is purely a business proposition, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HACKNEY] has just stated. Over $600,000 worth of timber, in the log, is in piles. It is exposed to fire, and if it remains in the pile during summer, through the hot season, it will not be worth the saw bill in the fall. Any man who knows anything about elm, basswood, birch, and maple logs knows that you can not leave them out of the water in the pile through the hot season and save anything out of them. Now, are you going to allow $600,000 worth of lumber, belonging to the Indians, to go to waste after $250,000 has been expended in cutting and piling it up? This territory had from 50,000,000 to 60,000,000 feet of timber blown down by a cyclone. There has been expended $250,000 under the law for cutting it and putting it in the pile, and that has come out of the Indian fund.

The law authorized the erection of sawmills under contract, the logs to be sawed at a price not exceeding $3.50 per thousand.

Owing, however, to labor conditions, the location of the timber, and the fact that the logs from this "blown-down" section would furnish employment for but two years, after which the mills would have to be removed, no contracts could be made for the erection of sawmills. Now, what is the result? Unless legislation of this kind is enacted soon—and it is an emergency matter—fifteen to twenty million feet of the logs now in piles, 8 to 10 miles from a railroad, will be lost. Unless boilers and other equipment of mills can be gotten in there while the ground is hard, it will be almost impossible to cut that lumber this summer. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it is always urged in the passage of a bill that is of doubtful propriety that somebody is going to suffer if it is not passed at once. Whose fault is that, if that be the case? Not the fault of Congress. Not the fault of the House. Not the fault of the Government. I do not believe anybody will suffer if this bill does not pass. This bill proposes an absolutely new departure in the theory of government. It came to the House in the form wherein it provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall erect sawmills upon all the Indian reservations in Wisconsin. If it shall apply to all the Indian reservations in Wisconsin, why not to all the Indian reservations throughout the country? If it shall apply to Indian reservations, why not apply it to everything that the Forestry Service advocates this bill for—to put sawmills in every national forest reserve? That is the proposition that is before the House in this bill. This bill is amended in the House so as to take in only the Menominee Reservation, but the gentlemen are so anxious in this House—the gentlemen who will be the conferees—or will be so anxious, to take in the Menominee Reservation that when the bill comes back from conference it will come out including all the Indian reservations in Wisconsin; and then next session, or at a soon session, gentlemen in Minnesota or elsewhere will urge that the Government of the United States shall engage in industrial occupations in their State. Everybody in the House who is familiar with the national forest reserves knows that that Service is extremely anxious that they shall be permitted to say what timber shall be cut on the forest reserves; that they shall be permitted to cut it, to erect sawmills to convert it into lumber, and they want to go so far as that they may take the money in and pay the money out, as is now the case in the Reclamation Service.

Now, it seems to me that the House ought to vote understandingly on a proposition of this nature. If it were merely a matter for this Indian reservation, no one would care. If it were even necessary for the preservation of the lumber on this Indian reservation, it would be different. Why does not the Government in advertising make the same proposition to the private parties, to convert this timber into lumber, that it makes to itself? If the private parties can not afford to erect sawmills on this reservations, how can the Government afford to do it—at somebody else's expense, it is true. If the Government proposes to cut the matured timber on this reservation, why not make that proposition to private parties, and then they can have sawmills enough erected? The whole purpose of this bill upon the part of the gentlemen in the Department—it is not the purpose of the gentleman advocating it on the floor, because the matter relates to his district—but the whole purpose of this bill is to get the Government committed to the proposition that the Government shall engage in industrial pursuits, that it shall make lumber out of timber that it owns, and commencing upon the Indian reservations on the ground that it is with the Indians' money that the Government commences it, as a sort of trustee, to follow it up with the proposition, which is a natural corollary, that the Government shall follow the lumber business on the national forest reserves. Now, if the House wants to engage in that, very well, but people ought to know what they are doing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think it well for the Government to take the Indians' money and buy them a mill and teach them how to saw lumber—better than to have them idle?

Mr. MANN. Well, if it is the purpose of the Government, after furnishing all the money that the Indians live on, to then engage in industrial pursuits all through the country in order to educate the Indians, I think we better commence a different policy. I am not in favor of that policy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman think that is a good idea?

Mr. MANN. It is easy enough for the Government to require that all the work shall be done by Indians if the sawing be done by private parties.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish the gentleman from New York would give me half a minute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. Two minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman from Tennessee is in favor of the bill, and I want to read this I have here.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am in favor of teaching the Indian how to saw logs and make lumber.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, these Indians have been doing that for more than eighteen years. Now, I shall read from the report of the Senate committee by one of the Senators from Wisconsin. It says:

> There still remains upon the Indian reservations of Wisconsin some fine bodies of timber. In fact, the only considerable stand of white pine still remaining are those upon the lands of the Indians. The timber upon the reservation of the Menominee Indians is the finest in the State. In addition to the pine, there are also large quantities of hard wood. The value of this timber is constantly increasing. The rapid disappearance of our forests increases the desire of the lumber and mill men to secure the timber from the lands of the Indians. In 1890 Congress authorized these Indians, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, to cut and sell not to exceed 20,000,000 feet of this timber in any one year. This law provided that the timber should be logged under the contract system. Under it contracts were let to Indians and to white men. Because of the anxiety of the contractors to take out as much timber as was permitted under the law, white labor as well as Indian labor was employed in the logging operations. The Indian funds were used to finance these operations. The net proceeds of the sale of the timber was credited to the Indian funds. The Indian received some financial benefit, but the system does nothing to educate him in the practical work of manufacturing the timber into lumber nor in the preservation and perpetuation of the forest.
> Under the contract system there has been a constant breaking down of the character of the Indian, a lowering of his standards. This system has brought upon the reservations white loggers. This has been done in opposition to the desires of the Indians. In many cases they have protested against the system, pointing out that it inevitably resulted in the introduction of intoxicating liquors upon the reservation, the demoralizing of the men, and the debauching of the women. A system which does these things should not be continued. It has not only resulted in his moral degradation, but the contract system also tends to prevent the development of the Indian as an industrial factor. The forests are cut away under conditions which make for a reckless destruction and do not in any way teach the Indians to properly conserve their resources.

Under this bill all restriction is removed. All of the valuable timber on the reservation can be taken out, and white help is to be used. A casual examination of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior makes this clear.

Mr. MORSE. Now, in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], I want to say that the object of this bill is to conserve that timber. The object of this bill is to get for the Indians every dollar they can get out of it. As a matter of fact, no timber can be cut except under the supervision of the Forestry Department. The Government is furnishing trained foresters for that very purpose. Under the old contract system the white men went in there and cut the best and ruined more than they took out.

Under this system it will all be saved. Under this system this timber that has been growing and piling up there for generations will be used for the men who own it and for whom it was created.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 17277. An act for the relief of George S. Patten, of Williams, Coconino County, Ariz.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENT.

The SPEAKER announced the following committee appointment:

Mr. KELIHER, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

VISITORS TO MILITARY AND NAVAL ACADEMIES.

The SPEAKER announced the following appointments as Visitors to Military and Naval Academies:

To the Military Academy:

Mr. CAPRON, Mr. CHANEY, and Mr. SHERWOOD.

To the Naval Academy:

Mr. STERLING, Mr. BATES, and Mr. WATKINS.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FOSTER of Indiana, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

CUTTING OF TIMBER ON INDIAN RESERVATIONS IN WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments.

The question was taken.

Pending the announcement of the result,

Mr. FITZGERALD. Division, Mr. Speaker. I wish to suggest it would require a quorum to pass this bill.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 42, noes 9.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to print some tobacco data in the RECORD.

Mr. PAYNE. That can not be done with no quorum present.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am asking that it be done——

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum, and nothing can be done when there is no quorum.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I stand by the Constitution, Mr. Speaker. I withdraw the request. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 17, 1908.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

REPORT ON ROAD BUILDING IN YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 6th instant, a report prepared by the engineer in charge of road building and improvement in the Yellowstone National Park on a survey made for a new road from the West Gallatin River to connect with the main traveled roadway in that park, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

USELESS PAPERS IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor, transmitting a schedule of papers, documents, etc., not needed or used in the transaction of the current business of that Department, and which have no permanent value or historical interest, which was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments. The Chair appoints as members of the committee on the part of the Senate the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and directs the Secretary to properly notify the House of Representatives thereof.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the annexed findings by the court relating to the vessel brig Sophia, Ambrose Shirley, master, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

S. 626. An act authorizing and empowering the Secretary of War to locate a right of way for, and granting the same, and a right to operate and maintain a line of railroad through the Three Tree Point Military Reservation, in the State of Washington, to the Grays Harbor and Columbia River Railway Company, its successors and assigns; and

S. R. 69. Joint resolution granting authority for the use of certain balances of appropriations for the Light-House Establishment, to be available for certain named purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 1424. An act to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army; and

S. 4112. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," approved April 5, 1906.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 225. An act to amend section 4463 of the Revised Statutes relating to the complement of crews of vessels, and for the better protection of life;

H. R. 13649. An act providing for the hearing of cases upon appeal from the district court for the district of Alaska in the circuit court of appeals for the ninth circuit;

H. R. 14789. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the protection of game in Alaska, and for other purposes," approved June 7, 1902; and

H. R. 17296. An act providing for the restoration of the motto "In God we trust" on certain denominations of the gold and silver coins of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15653) to increase the pension of widows, minor children, etc., of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. LOUDENSLAGER, and Mr. WEISSE managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 17277) for the relief of George S. Patten, of Williams, Coconino County, Ariz., and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. HALE. I present a memorial of the Peace Association of Friends of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the great addition to the Navy involved in the plan of authorizing at once the construction of four new battle ships and other cruisers and vessels for the United States Navy. I move that it be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL BANKING LAWS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Finance to report sundry amendments to Senate bill 3023, to amend the national banking laws, and I desire to make a very brief explanation of the purposes of the amendments.

The first amendment provides that no notes shall be issued upon any securities in excess of the par value of the bonds deposited.

The second amendment restores the $9,000,000 limitation on the monthly retirement of notes based upon United States bonds.

The third amendment strikes from the bill all provisions in regard to railroad bonds. When this paragraph was reached, it was passed over at my suggestion, with the statement that the committee would consider amendments to it.

The committee believed when the bill was reported, and they now believe, that it would be desirable to have for use as a basis for these emergency notes as large an amount as possible of available securities. But the committee find that questions are made and issues raised in regard to the use of railroad bonds which have no reference to the bill now under consideration—questions of the relation between the railroads and the public and as to the proper regulation of railroads and of the issue of railroad stocks and bonds. Under all the circumstances the committee have thought it better to ask the Senate to strike out the provisions which pertain to railroad bonds.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Has the Senator offered any amendment in relation to bank reserves?

Mr. ALDRICH. No; the committee has that question still under consideration, and will report an amendment or amendments within a very short time.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator from Rhode Island if it would not be well to have the bill reprinted as proposed to be amended by the committee?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that is a very good suggestion. I ask that a reprint be made that will incorporate the amendments suggested by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the financial bill be reprinted and that the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance be incorporated in it. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TREASURY ACCOUNTS.

Mr. ALDRICH. From the Committee on Finance I report back with an amendment the bill (S. 4049) for the relief of Edwin U. Curtis, assistant treasurer of the United States at Boston, and I submit a report thereon.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to credit in the accounts of the Treasurer of the United States the sum of $3,000, now carried in the accounts of the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States at Boston, Mass., and in the general account of the Treasurer of the United States as "unavailable funds" and representing a shortage found in June, 1907, in the amount of money belonging to the United States while in the custody of said assistant treasurer, the loss of said money having occurred through no fault or negligence on the part of said assistant treasurer, and said sum being the total amount carried in the statement of the Treasurer of the United States in his annual report for the year 1907 as "unavailable funds, office assistant treasurer of the United States at Boston, Mass." And for this purpose the said sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing a credit in certain accounts of the Treasurer of the United States."

APPRAISER OF MERCHANDISE.

Mr. ALDRICH. From the Committee on Finance I report back with an amendment the bill (S. 624) providing for the appointment of an appraiser of merchandise for the customs collection district of Puget Sound, State of Washington, and I submit a report thereon.

Mr. PILES. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was, in line 7, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four" and insert "three," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be in the customs collection district of Puget Sound, State of Washington, an appraiser of merchandise, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and with compensation at the rate of $3,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12292) for the relief of A. E. Couch, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STEPHENSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6664) for the relief of Roman Scholter, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FULTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 655) for the relief of Richard A. Proctor, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2986) to acquire certain land in Hall and Elvan's subdivision of Meridian Hill, in the District of Columbia, for a public park, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

MOBILE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. MARTIN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17311) to authorize the Pensacola, Mobile and New Orleans Railway Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Alabama, to construct a bridge over and across the Mobile River and its navigable channels on a line approximately east of the north boundary line of the city of Mobile, Ala., to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is very necessary that this bill should be passed at an early day, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATE CONTROL OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. CLAY. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (S. 28) to amend the act of March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to provide for ocean-mail service between the United States and foreign ports and to promote commerce." I ask that the amendment be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival within the borders of the State and before or after delivery to the consignee in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory, enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and the same manner as though such liquids or liquors had been produced in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FLINT submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for compensation and actual necessary traveling expenses of special agents to investigate trade conditions abroad, etc., Department of Commerce and Labor, from $35,000 to $50,000, intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

H. R. 17296. An act providing for the restoration of the motto "In God we trust" on certain denominations of the gold and silver coins of the United States, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

REORGANIZATION OF CONSULAR SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4112) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States," approved April 5, 1906.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, ask for a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice-President appointed Mr. LODGE, Mr. CULLOM, and Mr. BACON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1424) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, ask for a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to and the Vice-President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as conferees on the part of the Senate.

BETTER PROTECTION OF LIFE ON VESSELS.

The bill (H. R. 225) to amend section 4463 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the complement of crews of vessels and for the better protection of life, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, that is identical with the bill (S. 5787) to amend section 4463 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, being Order of Business 369. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed, and that the House bill be substituted for it on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 5787 be indefinitely postponed and that the House bill just reported be substituted in its place on the Calendar. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I observe that notice was given a few days ago that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] would speak this morning immediately after the morning business. I do not know whether it is his purpose to do so or not. He does not seem to be in the Chamber. If he does not desire to take the floor, I wish to call up the legislative, etc., appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] does not appear to be in the Chamber.

Mr. CULLOM. I will ask the Senate to proceed with the bill and if he comes in I will give way.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 16882) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes; which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee be first considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee be first considered. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead of "Senate, Office of Secretary," on page 2, line 20, before the word "dollars," to insert "two hundred and fifty;" and in line 21, after the word "incumbent," to strike out "minute and journal clerk, and enrolling clerk, at $3,000 each; principal clerk, $2,750," and insert "enrolling clerk, $3,000; minute and journal clerk, executive clerk, and principal clerk, at $2,750 each," so as to read:

Office of Secretary: For Secretary of the Senate, including compensation as disbursing officer of the contingent fund of the Senate, $5,000, and for compensation as disbursing officer of salaries of Senators, $396; hire of horse and wagon for the Secretary's office, $700; assistant secretary, Henry M. Rose, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,250; financial clerk, $3,000, and $1,250 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent; enrolling clerk, $3,000; minute and journal clerk, executive clerk, and principal clerk, at $2,750 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 7, to reduce the number of clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate at $2,220 each from six to five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 12, to increase the appropriation for the salary of the keeper of stationery from $2,120 to $2,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 17, to increase the total appropriation for the office of the Secretary of the Senate from $78,016 to $78,726.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 19, after the words "document room," to insert "(George H. Boyd);" in line 21, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "seven hundred and fifty;" and on page 4, line 3, before the word "dollars," to strike out "nine thousand nine hundred and eighty" and insert "ten thousand two hundred and thirty," so as to make the clause read:

Document room: For superintendent of the document room (George H. Boyd), $2,750; first assistant in document room, $2,000; assistant in document room, $1,600; assistant in document room, $1,440; clerk to superintendent of document room, $1,440; skilled laborer, $1,000; in all, $10,230.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for clerks and messengers to committees, on page 4, line 13, to increase the appropriation for the salary of the clerk and stenographer to the Committee on Finance from $2,500 to $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for clerks and messengers to committees, on page 4, line 19, to increase the appropriation for salary of assistant clerk to the Committee on Commerce from $1,440 to $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 10, to increase the appropriation for the salary of the clerk to the Committee on Foreign Relations from $2,220 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 2, after the word "Tributaries," to strike out "Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments" and insert "Expenditures in the Department of State;" and in line 5, after the words "United States," to insert "Canadian Relations, Transportation Routes to the Seaboard."

Mr. DIXON. I merely rise to make an inquiry. The bill is being read for amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is; and the amendments of the committee are being first acted upon.

Mr. DIXON. Will it be in order later on to offer amendments other than the committee amendments?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator will have that privilege.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 11, to increase the total appropriation for clerks and messengers to committees from $133,240 to $138,820.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 13, before the word "clerks," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-two;" and in line 15, before the word "dollars," to strike out "thirty-six thousand" and insert "thirty-nine thousand six hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For twenty-two clerks to committees, at $1,800 each, $39,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the item of appropriation for office of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, on page 6, line 24, to reduce the number of messengers at $1,440 each from forty-seven to forty-six.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 1, after the word "each," to strike out "two assistant messengers on the floor of the Senate, at $1,440 each" and insert "two messengers on the floor of the Senate, at $2,000 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I was called for a moment from the Senate Chamber and I had no idea the bill was coming up. We have gone by an amendment which I desired to take up, on page 3, superintendent of the document room. The amendment has already been passed by the Senate, I assume.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. As it has been agreed to, I can only return to it, of course, by unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the amendment will be regarded as open.

Mr. LODGE. It is the amendment in line 20, page 3, for superintendent of the document room. The superintendent of the document room named in the bill, George H. Boyd, has been in the service of the Senate and in the document room for twenty-six years. He has come up through all the grades and has just received the promotion, on the death of Mr. Smith. He has been a very faithful and excellent servant of the Senate, as the Senate is aware. The document room, as every Senator knows, is of immense importance to the comfort of the Senate and to the progress of legislation.

Mr. Smith received $3,000, which was first given to him many years ago on account of his extremely good service. The superintendent of the document room in the House receives $3,000 a year. He gets $2,500 in this bill and $500 on the general deficiency bill. There are employed in the document room of the House eleven persons; the superintendent has eight clerks and two assistants. Our superintendent has only four. Of course the work of the two document rooms does not materially vary.

I have asked to return to the amendment because I want to propose that the salary shall be kept at what it has been, $3,000, and which is the same as the superintendent of the document room of the House receives. I see the committee has raised some other salaries here—the salary of the enrolling clerk and others—to which I have no possible objection. It seems to me that this salary ought to be put on the same basis. The officer is a faithful officer, who has been, as I have said, twenty-six years in the document room alone.

Mr. CULLOM. The committee raised the salary from $2,500 to $2,750, and that is about as large as we thought he ought to have at this time. He was put in the office only a little while ago, and it seems to me that we treated him very well and that the Senator from Massachusetts ought to be satisfied with that increase. If we intend to increase the salaries of all the clerks in the Departments or in the Capitol we will increase many thousands before we get through. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will be satisfied with the increase that we make.

Mr. LODGE. It is not an increase that I am proposing. I am proposing precisely the same salary that the superintendent of the document room of the Senate has had before. This is a reduction from the salary that he has had, and there are other increases made here. I am only asking that the salary should be maintained at what it has been. The same salary that I ask is given in the House. I am asking for no increase.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will see that the House made it $2,500 and we increased it to $2,750.

Mr. LODGE. The pay of the employees of the Senate is fixed by the Senate, practically. The House does not settle what we shall pay our employees any more than we try to settle the pay of theirs. They pay their superintendent of the document room $3,000. I think that is a proper salary. We have paid our superintendent of the document room $3,000 for many years. In the natural course of promotion Mr. Boyd has received the place after, as I said, a service of twenty-six years. All I ask is that the salary should be retained.

Mr. CULLOM. We increased the salary of Amzi Smith, formerly the superintendent of the document room, because of his extraordinary value in that position and on account of the fact that he had been there a great many years. I think the Senate had better let the salary stay just where it is.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment to increase it to $3,000—that is, to increase the amount fixed by the committee $250, leaving the salary what it has been for many years.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes an amendment to the amendment of the committee which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 21, before the word "dollars," strike out "two thousand seven hundred and fifty" and insert "three thousand."

Mr. CULLOM. I simply desire to say again that the House put the salary at twenty-five hundred dollars; the Senate committee raised it to twenty-seven hundred and fifty dollars, and I hope the Senate will stand by the action of the committee.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Boyd has been receiving a salary of $2,500. The committee pay him a compliment in the bill by appropriating for him by name, so that he holds the place. It is quite a compliment to an employee of either the Senate or House to be appropriated for by name. We added his name and increased the salary that he has been receiving $250. The committee has given this matter very careful consideration, so as to keep it in line with other salaries, and the Senate, without very careful consideration, ought not to change the amount fixed by the committee.

If Mr. Boyd develops into such a man as Mr. Amzi Smith, who filled the position before Mr. Boyd was promoted to it, then at the next session of Congress his salary can be increased, but as we are now taking care of him by name in the bill and increasing his salary $250, it looks like it should satisfy the Senator from Massachusetts and other Senators, who, no doubt, understand that Mr. Boyd is really a man of unusual ability.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make an inquiry. Suppose we appropriate the salary for this man by name, would the salary be available should the man cease to become the officer, and we be called upon to appoint some one else?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It would not be available in that case. The salary for this particular position, if Mr. Boyd should die, would have to be taken care of in the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would inquire as to the wisdom of making an appropriation of that kind. This is a general appropriation bill, and the compliment might be extended through some less inconvenient method. I think we should make an appropriation for the office rather than for any man by name. We would not be in a very good position if the office should become vacant during a recess of Congress, and I think probably it would be just as well to strike out the name. I will move that the name "George H. Boyd" be stricken out.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I hope the Senator will not do that. I will certainly oppose striking out the name, because Mr. Boyd, by reason of his long service, is entitled to be appropriated for by name, but he ought to be satisfied with the increase of $250 in salary that he gets in the bill without an additional increase.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the case which the Senator from Idaho refers to occurred last summer, owing to the death of Mr. Smith. Under the existing law, Mr. Boyd simply took charge at the salary which he had as assistant, and it required action in the urgent deficiency bill to make an appropriation for the office of Superintendent of Documents. There was no difficulty in arranging that part of it. The Superintendent of Documents has already been named in the bill, as we name the Assistant Secretary of the Senate. I think that is a very proper thing to do, and I am glad the committee did it.

My only point is that I am not asking for an increase. I am not proposing to add one cent to what has been appropriated for the payment of this office for years. Since that additional salary was given to Amzi Smith years ago there has been an increase in all salaries and in living expenses very largely, and it seemed to me that there was no reason for bringing it below $3,000.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator how long it has been since the salary of $3,000 was given to Mr. Smith?

Mr. LODGE. I can not tell the Senator when Mr. Smith's salary was raised to $3,000, but it was done before I entered the Senate.

Mr. BACON. That is the point of my inquiry, whether $3,000 has been for a long time the recognized salary of the office.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, is ft not true that the salary was given Mr. Smith because of his long service and unusual ability? The salary was not intended to go with the office, but it was simply a compliment to a man of unusual ability.

I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts another question. As a matter of fact, does not Mr. Boyd by this bill receive an increase of $250 in the salary as compared with his salary received heretofore?

Mr. LODGE. He receives an increase of $250 over the salary fixed by the urgent deficiency bill three months ago.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And the salary that he has constantly received as an employee of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; but he has been promoted. He has a different office; he has been raised. He has been trained there under Mr. Smith and he has been there, as I have stated, for twenty-six years, which is good proof of faithful service and that he understands the business of the office. It seems to me, in view of what the House pays and what Mr. Smith received, doing precisely the same duties with a force not half as large as the force given in the House, that $3,000 is not an excessive salary and that there is no reason for giving the superintendent less than the office has received for many, many years.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the committee. It will be again stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 21, before the word "dollars," strike out "2,750" and insert in lieu thereof "3,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho propose an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to withdraw the amendment in view of the action that has been taken.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment to the amendment is withdrawn.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to know what became of the amendment on page 2 of the bill. Is the bill now being read for amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is being read for the consideration of amendments, and the committee amendments are first considered.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should like to have it understood that the amendment at the bottom of page 2 may be reserved for consideration at a future time. I understand that that is a reduction of the salary of certain officers of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. It is not. The action of the Senate just now in disposing of the superintendent of the document room increases the salary from $2,750, as the committee had it, to $3,000, according to the vote. I think it was a serious mistake to do it, but it has been done, and I recognize the fact.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Illinois may be correct, but I do not read the bill in that way.

Mr. CULLOM. I refer to the superintendent of the document room on page 4.

Mr. CULBERSON. In line 20, the words "minute and journal clerk and enrolling clerk, at $3,000 each" have been stricken out and the words "enrolling clerk, $3,000; minute and journal clerk," and so forth, "at $2,750," inserted, showing that there has been a reduction.

Mr. CULLOM. Those amendments have been passed on and adopted.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand. The bill is unexpectedly reached, and this amendment was adopted before Senators understood almost that the bill was being read. I simply requested that I might reserve an objection to this amendment for consideration at some other time.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator will have a right to oppose the amendment when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that, but I want it in Committee of the Whole also.

Mr. CULLOM. Well, that can be done, too.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 11, after the word "dollars," to insert "two skilled laborers, at $1,000 each;" and in line 12, before the word "skilled," to strike out "four" and insert "two," so as to read:

Messenger to official reporters' room, to be selected by the official reporters, $1,440; storekeeper, $1,800; upholsterer and locksmith, $1,440; four carpenters to assist him, at $960 each; janitor, $1,200; skilled laborer, $1,000; two skilled laborers, at $1,000 each; two skilled laborers, at $900 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 17, after the word "dollars," to strike out "assistant in press gallery, $900" and insert "superintendent of press gallery, $1,600; assistant superintendent of press gallery, $1,200," so as to read:

Laborer in charge of private passage, $840; two female attendants in charge of ladies' retiring room, at $720 each; two telephone operators, at $900 each; telephone page, $720; superintendent of press gallery, $1,600; assistant superintendent of press gallery, $1,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 1, to increase the total appropriation for office of Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper from $156,624 to $158,404.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 7, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "six;" and in line 11, before the word "and," to strike out "eighteen thousand nine hundred" and insert "nineteen thousand one hundred," so as to make the clause read:

Post-office: For Postmaster, $2,250; assistant postmaster and mail carrier, $2,088; clerk, $1,600; seven mail carriers and one wagon master, at $1,200 each; four riding pages, at $912.50 each; in all, $19,188.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 23, after the word "dollars," to insert "assistant engineer and electrician, $1,800;" in line 24, before the word "assistant," to strike out "four" and insert "three;" on page 9, line 4, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "four;" in line 7, after the word "dollars," to insert "one attendant for service in old library portion of the Capitol, $1,500;" and in line 9, after the word "all," to strike out "twenty-seven thousand six hundred and sixty-five" and insert "twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and twenty-five," so as to make the clause read:

Under Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds: For chief engineer, $2,160; assistant engineer and electrician, $1,800; three assistant engineers, at $1,440 each; eight conductors of elevators, at $1,200 each; machinist and electrician, $1,400; machinist and electrician, $1,400; three firemen, at $1,095 each; five laborers, at $720 each; laborer in charge of Senate toilet rooms in old library space, $660; one attendant for service in old library portion of the Capitol, $1,500; in all, $29,725.

The amendment was agreed to.

For an additional amount for the foregoing purposes, $5,000.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why the amendment which has just been stated, on page 40, lines 21 and 22, is made in the peculiar way in which it reads?

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, the desire on the part of those who are interested in it was that we should increase the item in the preceding paragraph from seven to twelve thousand dollars. We concluded finally to give them $5,000 more, but to put it in a separate item, so that when the special reasons for the extra amount no longer exist they could drop back to the original amount for the next appropriation. The amendment is simply stated in a way to call attention to the increase for a special purpose, the immediate improvement of a few rooms, etc. It is exactly right.

Mr. BURKETT. Then, it is a special appropriation only for this year.

Mr. CULLOM. For this year simply, and we separate the item, so that it may be understood in that way.
